

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

Mr. CLARK begs leave respectfully to acquaint the C and STUDENTS of DIVINITY, that the undermentioned will speedily be published.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

1. ELEMENTS OF CHURCH HISTORY.

By the Rev. DAVID WELSH, D. D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Edinbu

BIBLICAL CRITICISM AND EXPOSIT

2. COMMENTARIES ON THE GOSPEL OF St. JO By Dr. C. C. TITTMAN,

Professor of Theology in the University of Wittenberg.

3. EXPOSITION OF THE PSALMS OF DAVID, &
By Dr. E. W. HENGSTENBERG,
Professor of Theology in the University of Berlin.

Just Published.

Translated by the Rev. PATRICK FAIRBAIRN.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

1. JUSTIN MARTYR—HIS LIFE, WRITINGS, DOCTRINES.

By the Rev. CHARLES SEMISCH, of Trebnitz, in Silesi Translated from the German by J. E. RYLAND, Esq.

SACRED GEOGRAPHY.

2. HISTORICO-GEOGRAPHICAL ACCOUNT OF LESTINE IN THE TIME OF CHRIST;

The Bible Student's Help to a thorough knowledge of Sc By D. J. RÖHR.

SEVENTH EDITION.

Translated from the German by the Rev. David Esdaile, Notes and Corrections.

3. PROFESSOR HUPFELD'S HEBREW GRAM!

Translated from the German, with Notes, by the Rev. SAMT

DAVIDSON, LL.D. (Preparing for Publication.)

"This copious Grammar, which is now in course of publication many, is by one of the first Hebraists in Europe, and will probe stitute as great an era in the science of Hebrew Grammar, as did (—Lehrgebäude.

SACRED HERMENEUTICS.

In one thick Volume Octavo, handsomly bound in Cloth, 21s.

IACRED HERMENEUTICS DEVELOPED AND APPLIED including A HISTORY OF BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION FROM THE EARLIEST OF THE FATHERS TO THE RE. FORMATION. By the Rev. Samuel Davidson, LL.D. Professol of Biblical Literature in the Lancashire Independent College.

Chap. I. HERMENEUTICAL QUALIFICATIONS .- II. USE OF REASON # THE EXPOSITION OF SCRIPTURE.—III. LIMITATIONS OF THE SEN IMENT, that the language of the Bible should be interpreted like that o ther books. — Some peculiarities in Biblical Interpretation.—IV. AL. BEODICAL INTERPRETATION.—V. HISTORY OF BIBLICAL INTERPRE ATION .- PATRISTIC PERIOD -Barnabas-Hermas-Clement of Rome -Ignatius-Polycarp-Justin Martyr-Clement of Alexandria-Irenæus -The Clementine Recognitions - Tertullian - Origen - Cyprian - The Tradition of the Alexandrian Church—The Tradition of the Latin Church regory Thaumaturgus - Hippolytus - Eusebius - Athanasius - Ephraen he Syrian—Basil the Great—Gregory of Nazianzum—Gregory of Nyssi -Diodorus-Chrysostom-Hilary-Ambrose-Jerome -Augustine-Ti honius—Theedoret—Cyril of Alexandria—Isidore of Pelusium—Pelagius -Julian-Vincentius Lirinensis- Andreas- Cassiodorus- Gregory the Freat - General Estimate of the Fathers. -VI. HISTORY OF BIBLI LINTERPRETATION IN THE HIERARCHICAL PERIOD, or from the eginning of the Seventh Century to the Reformation - Bede - Alcuin -Phabanus Maurus-Walafrid Strabo-Druthmar-Claudius-Ecumeniu -Arethas -Notker -Theophylact - Lanfranc - Nicetas - Peter Lombarc - Euthymius - Zigabenus - Rupertus - Thomas Aquinas - Hugo de St. Care -Albert-Bonaventura-Nicolaus de Lyra-Gerson-John Wessel-John Juss-Paulus Burgensis-Laurentius Valla-James Faber Stapulensis-Frasmus-Review of the Second Period .- VII. SYSTEMS OF INTERRE ATION. The Moral or Kantian The Psychologico-Historical The Accommodation System-The Mythic-The Rationalistic-The Pietist-7111. THE PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION STATED AND EXEMPLY 'IED .- IX. THE PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION APPLIED TO FI FURATIVE LANGUAGE.—X. USE OF HISTORICAL CIRCUMSTANCES 12 NTERPRETATION. -XI. QUOTATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT N THE NEW .- Introductory Formulas -- Conformity with the Originals --The purposes for which citations were made-Important Formulas-Sup osed Instances of accommodation-Quotations Classified-Their connexion with Verbal Inspiration.—XII. ALLEGED CONTRADICTIONS OF SCRIP CURE—Discrepancies between the OLD TESTAMENT WRITERS—Discrepancies between the NEW TESTAMENT WRITERS—Discrepancies be Ween the OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT WRITERS. XIII. ANCIEN: VERSIONS, COMMENTARIES, AND LEXICONS, AS SOURCES OF INTER 'RETATION.-XIV. COGNATE LANGUAGES AS SOURCES OF INTER *RETATION.-1. The Arabic. 2. The Syriac. 3. The Chaldee.-XV JSE OF GENERAL INFORMATION IN THE INTERPRETATION O SCRIPTURE.—Comprehending, 1. General History. 2. Chronology. Archaeology. 4. Geography. 5. Natural History. 6. Geology. 7. Melicine, &c.—XVI. Biographical Account of Hermeneutical Writers from be Reformation to the Present Time, containing an anelysis of their Works ith a critical estimate of their value. THREE INDI ES.

Edinburgh: THOMAS CLARK. London: Ilamilton & Adams.
Dublin: CURRY & Co.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM, AND EXPOSITION.

Price 14s. handsomely bound in cloth, with Facsimiles of ancient MSS.

LECTURES on BIBLICAL CRITICISM, Exhibiting
a Systematic View of that Science. By SAMUEL DAVIDSON, LL. D. Professor of Biblical Literature in the Royal Academical Institution, Belfast.

LECTURE I. Introductory.—II. On ancient MSS.— III. to X. Ancient Versions, including the Septuagint, the Latin, and Samaritan, &c. &c .- XI. Quotations of ancient Writers.—XII. Critical Conjecture.—XIII. to XVII. Disputed Portions of the New Testament .- XVIII. On the Causes of Various Readings in the Old and New Testaments.—XIX. History of the Text of the Old Testament. _XX. History of the Text of the New Testament.__ XXI. The Divisions and Marks of Distinction in the Hebrew Bible, and Greek Testament.-XXII. Nature of the Hebrew Language.—XXIII. On the Hebrew Characters. -XXIV. Language of the New Testament.-XXV. The Greek Article.—XXVI. On the Original Language of the Gosrel, by Matthew.—Supplementary Observations.—Appendix, containing a List of the different Works referred to throughout the work, with Bibliographical Notices, &c.

"All the subjects connected with Biblical criticism, which are within the pale of what a parochial minister may advantageously know, are fully discussed in the present volume; and the information which it contains, whilst it is sufficiently copious for any ordinary student, is much more to be depended on than in the larger work of Mr Horne."—Edinburgh Review.

"This unpretending volume is more than its title-page asserts for it. Professor Davidson has done great justice to a most essential part of the education of a clergyman. His task was no light one, and the manner of its discharge merits the gratitude of the student."—Church of England Quarterly Review.

"The various topics embraced in Dr Davidson's volume, are treated in such a way as to show that instead of servilely copying from copyists, he has gone to the sources of authority, and examined, and judged for himself. His reasonings and results are conveyed in a lively and spirited style, at the farthest possible remove from the dry, abstract, barren prosings which usually distinguish treatises of this nature."—American Biblical Repository.

"Great, therefore, is our pleasure and thankfulness that we can now point to a work, which seems to approach as nearly to completeness as the nature of the subject will admit."—CONGREGATIONAL MAG.

"We have great pleasure in introducing this learned and useful work to the notice of those biblical students who read our pages; conceiving that they will agree with us in regarding it as one of the most valuable accessions which our Theological literature has received for some time past."—Evangelical Magazine

Negris and Duncan's Edition of ROBINSON'S GREEK an ENGLISH LEXICON of the New Testament, 8vo. price 15s.

The cheapest and most accurate edition of the best Lexicon of the New Testament.

44 This edition by Messrs. Negris and Duncan, we venture to assert, the MOST ACCUBATE edition of a Lexicon which is any where to be met with In this respect it much excels even the original."—Church Review.

"The present edition by Messrs. Negris and Duncan may be pronounced as, in all respects, the BEST of this invaluable Lexicon of the Ne Testament." - Orthodox Presbyterian.

- "The Edinburgh edition is corrected with an exquisite care by two ditinguished scholars, whose names are mentioned. The publisher, M Clark, to whose zealous, liberal, and disinterested exertions biblical know ledge is deeply indebted, has stated that several thousand errors have been detected, many of them of vital importance, and that Mr. Duncan a made many corrections and additions, which are distinguished by being brackets. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that on a comparison of to two editions, he (Dr. Robinson) would give his suffrage in favour of M Clark's."—Eelectic Review.
- "In justice to the editor and publisher of the Edinburgh edition, we must state, it is as beautifully as it is correctly printed. The Greek potion has been carefully revised by Mr. Negris, a native of Greece, and one the most learned Hellenists of the present day, who has distinguished hin self by his very accurate editions of the works of Herodotus and Pinda and portions of the writings of Demosthenes, Æschenes and Xenophor and the revision of the Hebrew parts of Dr. Robinson's Lexicon has bee undertaken by the Rev. John Duncan, who has made many additions whis are printed between brackets []. British students are deeply indebted fitheir indefatigable exertions to present Dr. Robinson's valuable work them, in a form which unites reasonableness of price, with correctness at peanty of typographical execution."—Christian Remembrancer.

"Another edition of the same work is now issued in Edinburgh, ar from a press which has already supplied many important publications of the subject of Biblical Literature. It is very elegantly printed; and, so f as we are able to judge from a cursory examination, is also, in point of a curacy, fully worthy of its respectable editors.

"Upon the whole we may justly pronounce this to be a beautiful, correct and amended reprint of Dr. Robinson's work."—Methodist Magazine.

"Dr. Robinson regretted that it (Bloomfield's edition) had not been give to the British public, as he had given it to the American, but that alteration were made which were opposed to his wishes and judgment.

"The present edition, for which we are indebted to the spirited publish of the Biblical Cabinet, has been revised by two gentlemen of great em nence (Messrs. Negris and Duncan) who have confined themselves to the appropriate work of editors.

"We prefer this edition to any other that has yet appeared. The type graphy is beautiful; and considering the extent of the work, and the expense of Greek and Hebrew printing, the price is remarkably low.

"We regard this Lexicon as a valuable addition to philological science and on the whole, the BEST Lexicon upon the New Testament which student could purchase."—Baptist Magazine.

Negris' Greek Classics,

with notes, various readings, and emendations.

I. The Medea of Euripedes, foolscap 8vo. price 2s. 6d.

II. The Philoctetes of Sophocles, foolscap 8vo. price 2s. 6d.

111. The Prometheus Chained of Æschvlus, foolscan 810 price 2s 6

The Students' Cabinet Library of Useful Tracts.

No

1. Dr Reynolds' Hints on the Preservation of the Ryea, 1s.
2. Prof. Hitchcock on the Connection between Geology and Natural Religion, 6d.
3. Dr Channing on the Importance and Means of a National Literature, 6d.
4. Negris' Literary History of Modern Greece, 6d.
5. Prof. Robinson's Concise View of Education in the Universities of Germany, 1s. 6d.
6. Dr Reynolds on the Necessity of Physical Culture to Literary Men, 6d.
7. Edwards' State of Slavery in Ancient Greece, 6d.
8. Dr. Reynolds on the Constant of Physical Culture for Literary Men, 6d.
9. Revenue of The Market of Slavery in Ancient Greece, 6d.
8. Dr. Reynolds on the Constant of the Market of Literary Men, 6d.

Rdwards' State of Slavery in Ancient Greece, 6d.
 Prof. J. G. Richhorn's Account of the Life and Writings of J. D. Michaelis, 9d.
 Prof. Staendlin's History of Theological Knowledge and Literature, 6d.
 The Hon. C. G. Verplanck's Discourse on the Right Moral Influence and Use of Liberal Studies, 6d.
 Dr Ware on the Character and Duties of a Physician, 6d.
 The Hon. J. Story's First Discourse on the Progress of Science and Literature, 6d.
 Life of Niebuhr, by his Son, 1s. Biographical Series, No. 1.
 Life of Kant, by Frof. Stapfor, 1s. Biographical Series, No. 2.
 Life of Madame de Stael, by Mrs Child, 1s. 6d. Biographical Series, No. 3.
 Hon. J. Story's 2d, 3d, and 4th Discourses on Science, Literature, Government, 1s.
 Prof. Sawyer's Popular Treaties on the Riements of Biblical Interpretation, 1s.
 Mr Edwards Inquiry into the State of Slavery in the Early and Middle Ages of the Christian Ray, 9d.

Mr Edwards' Inquiry into the State of Slavery in the Early and Middle Ages of the Christian Ra., 9d.
 Hitchcock on the Connection between Geology and the Mosaic Account of the Creation, 1s. 6d. Scientific Series, No. 1.
 Prof. Moses Staart's Philological View of the Modern Doctrines of Geology, 1s. Scientific Series, No. 2.
 Life of Lady Rassell, by Mrs Child, 1s. 6d. Biographical Series. No. 4.
 Dr Channing's Dissertation on Slavery, 1s. 6d.
 Prof. Ware on Extemporaneous Preaching, 1s. Scientific Series, No. 3.
 Dr Channing on the Character and Writings of Archbishop Fenelon, 6d.
 Dr Channing on the Life and Character of Napoleon Bonaparte, 1s. 3d.
 Hon. E. Evreret's Discourses on the Importance of Scientific Knowledge, 1s. 6d.
 Hon. E. Stronk Reynolds' Discourses to the Students of the Royal Academy, Parts I. and II. 1s. 9d. each.
 Pand 30. Prof. Hitchcock's Historical and Geological Deluges compared, 1s. 3d. and Parts 1, and 11. 18. 9d. each.

and 30. Prof. Hitchcock's Historical and Geological Deluges compared, 1s. 3d. and 1s. 6d. Scientific Series, No. 4 and 5.

3, 34, and 35. Jouffroy's Philosophical Resays, 2s., 1s. 3d., 2s.

and 33. Counin's Philosophical Resays, 1s. and 3s.

5. Dr Channing on Self-Culture, Immortality, and a Puture Life, 1s. 3d.

7. Biographical Sketch of Dr Tholuck, Professor of Theology in the University of Walls. Ry Professor Dark Andrews Call.

Mographical Section of Thomas, Professor of Theology in the University of Halle. By Professor Park, Andover, 6d.
 Prof. Tholuck's Remarks on the Life, Character, and Style of the Apostle Paul, designed as an Introduction to the Study of the Pauline Epistles, is.
 Prof. Tholuck's Sermons on various occasions, is. 6d.
 Prof. Tholuck on the Nature and Moral Influence of Heathenism, especially among the Greeks and Romans, viewed in the light of Christianity, 3s.
 Dr Ullmann on the Sinless Character of Jesus.

42. Dr Buckert on the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead

The Cabinet Library of Scarce and Celebrated Tracts.

1. Str. J. Mackintosh's Discourse on the Study of the Law of Nature and Nations, 1s. 6d.

2. Hon. Justice Story's Discourse on the Past History, Present State, and Fature
Prospects of the Law, 1s. 6d.

Lowman's Argument to prove the Unity and Perfections of God a priori, with an Introduction by the Kev. Dr Pye Smith, 1s. Theological Series, No. 1.

Sir W. Scott's (late Lord Stowell) Indement pronounced in the Consistory Court of London, in the Case of Dalrymple, the Wife, v. Dalrymple, the Husband, 3s.

Sir W. Scott's Judgments pronounced in the Cases of, 1. The Maria; 2. The Gratistical Samples of the Case of Dalrymple, the Wife, v. Dalrymple, the Husband, 3s.

titudine, 3s.

5. Jenkinson, Rarl of Liverpool, on the Conduct of the Government of Great Britain in respect to Neutral Nations, 3s.

7. Controversy respecting the Law of Nations; specially relative to Prussia's Attachment of British Funds by way of Reprisal for English Captures, 3s.

8. The Bight Hon. Edmund Burke's Letter to a Noble Lord, 1s. 3d.

9. Warnkonig's Analysis of Savigny's Treatise on the Law of Possession, 1s. 6d.

BIBLICAL CABINET;

OR

HERMENEUTICAL, EXEGETICAL,

AND

PHILOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

TITTMANN'S SYNONYMS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

EDINBURGH:

THOMAS CLARK, 38, GEORGE STREET;
J. G. & F. RIVINGTON, LONDON;
AND W. CURRY, JUN. & CO. DUBLIN.

MDCCCSZ ZIII.

SACRED HERMENEUTICS.

In one thick Volume Octavo, handsomly bound in Cloth, 21s.

SACRED HERMENEUTICS DEVELOPED AND APPLIE including A HISTORY OF BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIOF FROM THE EARLIEST OF THE FATHERS TO THE R FORMATION. By the Rev. SAMUEL DAVIDSON, LL.D. Profess of Biblical Literature in the Lancashire Independent College.

Chap. I. HERMENEUTICAL QUALIFICATIONS,—II. USE OF REASS

:TIMENT, that the language of the Bible should be interpreted like that other books. — Some peculiarities in Biblical Interpretation. — IV. A LEGORICAL INTERPRETATION. —V. HISTORY OF BIBLICAL INTERPR TATION .- PATRISTIC PERIOD -Barnabas-Hermas-Clement of Roll -Ignatius-Polycarp-Justin Martyr-Clement of Alexandria-Irena -The Clementine Recognitions - Tertullian - Origen - Cyprian - T Fradition of the Alexandrian Church-The Tradition of the Latin Church Gregory Thaumaturgus - Hippolytus - Eusebius - Athanasius - Ephrae the Syrian—Basil the Great—Gregory of Nazianzum—Gregory of Ny -Diodorus-Chrysostom-Hilary-Ambrose-Jerome -Augustinechonius-Theedoret-Cyril of Alexandria-Isidore of Pelusium-Pelagi -Julian-Vincentius Lirinensis- Andreas- Cassiodorus- Gregory t Great - General Estimate of the Fathers. -VI. HISTORY OF BIBL CAL INTERPRETATION IN THE HIERARCHICAL PERIOD, or from 1 beginning of the Seventh Century to the Reformation - Bede - Alcuin Rhabanus Maurus-Walafrid Strabo-Druthmar-Claudius-Œcumen -Arethas -Notker -Theophylact -Lanfranc Nicetas - Peter Lomba -Euthymius-Zigabenus-Rupertus-Thomas Aquinas-Hugo de St. C: -Albert-Bonaventura-Nicolaus de Lyra-Gerson-John Wessel-Jo Huss-Paulus Burgensis-Laurentius Valla-James Faber Stapulensis Erasmus—Review of the Second Period.—VII. SYSTEMS OF INTERS TATION .- The Moral or Kantian-The Psychologico-Historical-I Accommodation System-The Mythic-The Rationalistic-The Pietisi VIII. THE PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION STATED AND EXEMP FIED. -IX. THE PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION APPLIED TO GURATIVE LANGUAGE. - X. USE OF HISTORICAL CIRCUMSTANCES INTERPRETATION .- XI. QUOTATIONS FROM THE OLD TESTAME IN THE NEW .- Introductory Formulas-Conformity with the Originals The purposes for which citations were made-Important Formulas-Si posed Instances of accommodation-Quotations Classified-Their connex with Verbal Inspiration .- XII. ALLEGED CONTRADICTIONS OF SCR TURE-Discrepancies between the OLD TESTAMENT WRITERS-L crepancies between the NEW TESTAMENT WRITERS-Discrepancies tween the OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT WRITERS. XIII. ANCIE VERSIONS, COMMENTARIES, AND LEXICONS, AS SOURCES OF INTI PRETATION .- XIV. COGNATE LANGUAGES AS SOURCES OF INTI PRETATION.—1. The Arabic. 2. The Syriac. 3. The Chaldee.—2. USE OF GENERAL INFORMATION IN THE INTERPRETATION SCRIPTURE.—Comprehending, 1. General History. 2. Chronology. Archaeology. 4. Geography. 5. Natural History. 6. Geology. 7. 1 dicine, &c.—XVI. Biographical Account of Hermaneutical Writers f. the Reformation to the Present Time, containing an anelysis of their Wor ith a critical estimate of their value. THREE INDI ES.

Edinburgh: THOMAS CLARK. London: HAMILTON & ADAM: Dublin: CURRY & Co.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM, AND EXPOSITION.

Price 14a, handsomely bound in cloth, with Facsimiles of ancient MSS.

LECTURES on BIBLICAL CRITICISM, Exhibiting
a Systematic View of that Science. By SAMUEL DAVIDSON, LL. D. Professor of Biblical Literature in the Royal Academical Institution, Belfast.

LECTURE I. Introductory .- II. On ancient MSS .-III. to X. Ancient Versions, including the Septuagint, the Latin, and Samaritan, &c. &c .- XI. Quotations of ancient Writers.—XII. Critical Conjecture.—XIII. to XVII. Disputed Portions of the New Testament .-- XVIII. On the Causes of Various Readings in the Old and New Testaments.—XIX. History of the Text of the Old Testament. -XX. History of the Text of the New Testament.-XXI. The Divisions and Marks of Distinction in the Hebrew Bible, and Greek Testament.-XXII. Nature of the Hebrew Language.—XXIII. On the Hebrew Characters. -XXIV. Language of the New Testament-XXV. The Greek Article.—XXVI. On the Original Language of the Gospel, by Matthew-Supplementary Observations-Appendix, containing a List of the different Works referred to throughout the work, with Bibliographical Notices, &c.

"All the subjects connected with Biblical criticism, which are within the pale of what a parochial minister may advantageously know, are fully discussed in the present volume; and the information which it contains, whilst it is sufficiently copious for any ordinary student, is much more to be depended on than in the larger work of Mr Horne."—Edinauch Review.

"This unpretending volume is more than its title-page asserts for it. Professor Davidson has done great justice to a most essential part of the education of a clergyman. His task was no light one, and the manner of its discharge merits the gratitude of the student."—Снижен

OF ENGLAND QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"The various topics embraced in Dr Davidson's volume, are treated in such a way as to show that instead of servilely copying from copyists, he has gone to the sources of authority, and examined, and judged for himself. His reasonings and results are conveyed in a lively and spirited style, at the farthest possible remove from the dry, abstract, barren prosings which usually distinguish treatises of this nature."—
AMERICAN BIBLICAL REPOSITORY.

"Great, therefore, is our pleasure and thankfulness that we can now point to a work, which seems to approach as nearly to completeness as the nature of the subject will admit."—CONGREGATIONAL MAG.

"We have great pleasure in introducing this learned and useful work to the notice of those biblical students who read our pages; conceiving that they will agree with us in regarding it as one of the most valuable accessions which our Theological literature has received for some time past."—EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE

Negris and Duncam's Edition of ROBINSON'S GREEK and ENGLISH LEXICON of the New Testament, 8vo. price 15s.

. The cheapest and most accurate edition of the best Lexicon of the New Testament.

"This edition by Messrs. Negris and Duncan, we venture to assert, if the MOST ACCUBATE edition of a Lexicon which is any where to be met with In this respect it much excels even the original."—Church Review.

"The present edition by Messrs. Negris and Duncan may be pronounced as, in all respects, the BEST of this invaluable Lexicon of the New Testament." — Orthodox Presbyterian.

- "The Edinburgh edition is corrected with an exquisite care by two distinguished scholars, whose names are mentioned. The publisher, Mr Clark, to whose zealous, liberal, and disinterested exertions biblical knowledge is deeply indebted, has stated that several thousand errors have been detected, many of them of vital importance, and that Mr. Duncan ammale many corrections and additions, which are distinguished by being us brackets. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that on a comparison of the two editions, he (Dr. Robinson) would give his suffrage in favour of Mr Clark's."—Eolectic Review.
- "In justice to the editor and publisher of the Edinburgh edition, we must state, it is as beautifully as it is correctly printed. The Greek portion has been carefully revised by Mr. Negris, a native of Greece, and one of the most learned Hellenists of the present day, who has distinguished him self by his very accurate editions of the works of Herodotus and Pindar and portions of the writings of Demosthenes, Æschenes and Xenophon and the revision of the Hebrew parts of Dr. Robinson's Lexicon has been undertaken by the Rev. John Duncan, who has made many additions which are printed between brackets []. British students are deeply indebted for their indefatigable exertions to present Dr. Robinson's valuable work to them, in a form which unites reasonableness of price, with correctness and peauty of typographical execution."—Christian Remembrancer.

"Another edition of the same work is now issued in Edinburgh, and from a press which has already supplied many important publications or the subject of Biblical Literature. It is very elegantly printed; and, so far as we are able to judge from a cursory examination, is also, in point of accuracy, fully worthy of its respectable editors.

"Upon the whole we may justly pronounce this to be a beautiful, correct and amended reprint of Dr. Robinson's work."—Methodist Magazine.

"Dr. Robinson regretted that it (Bloomfield's edition) had not been given to the British public, as he had given it to the American, but that alterations were made which were opposed to his wishes and judgment.

"The present edition, for which we are indebted to the spirited publisher of the Biblical Cabinet, has been revised by two gentlemen of great emence (Messrs. Negris and Duncan) who have confined themselves to the appropriate work of editors.

"We prefer this edition to any other that has yet appeared. The typography is beautiful; and considering the extent of the work, and the expense of Greek and Hebrew printing, the price is remarkably low.

"We regard this Lexicon as a valuable addition to philological science and on the whole, the BEST Lexicon upon the New Testament which student could purchase."—Baptist Magazine.

Negris' Greek Classics,

with notes, various readings, and emendations.

I. The Medes of Euripedes, foolscap 8vo. price 2s. 6d.

II. The Philoctetes of Sophocles, foolscap 8vo. price 2s. 6d.

II. The Prometheus Chained of Exchylus, foolscap 8vo price 2s. 6d.

The Students' Cabinet Library of Useful Tracts.

1. Dr Reynolds' Hints on the Preservation of the Kyea, is.
2. Frof. Hitchcock on the Connection between Geology and Natural Religion, 6d.
3. Dr Channing on the Importance and Means of a National Literature, 6d.
4. Negris' Literary History of Modern Greece, 6d.
4. Prof. Robinson's Concise View of Education in the Universities of Germany, is. 6d.
4. Dr Beynolds on the Necessity of Physical Culture to Literary Men, 6d.
5. Revards' State of Slavery in Ancient Greece, 6d.
6. Prof. J. G. Kichhorn's Account of the Life and Writings of J. D. Michaelis, 9d.
7. Prof. J. G. Kichhorn's Account of the Life and Writings of J. D. Michaelis, 9d.
7. Prof. Staendlin's History of Theological Knowledge and Literature, 6d.
7. The Hon. C. G. Verplanck's Discourse on the Right Moral Influence and Use of Liberal Studies, 6d.
7. Liberal Studies, 6d.
7. The Hon. J. Study's First Discourse on the Progress of Science and Literature, 6d.

Dr Ware on the Character and Duties of a Physician, 6d.
 The Hon. J. Story's First Discourse on the Progress of Science and Literature, 6d.
 Life of Kiebuhr, by his Son, Is. Biographical Series, No. 1.
 Life of Kant, by Prof. Stapfer, Is. Biographical Series, No. 2.
 Life of Madame de Stael, by Mrs Child, Is. 6d. Biographical Series, No. 3.
 Hon. J. Story's 2d, 3d, and 4th Discourses on Science, Literature, Government, Is. 7. Prof. Saver's Popular Treatise on the Elements of Biblical Interpretation, Is.
 Mr Edwards' Inquiry into the State of Slavery in the Early and Middle Ages of the Circuits and Rrs. 9d.
 Hitchcock on the Connection between Geology and the Mossic Account of the Creation Is 6d. Scientific Series No.

Creation, 1s. 6d. Scientific Series, No. 1.

2. Prof. Moses Stuart's Philological View of the Modern Doctrines of Geology, 1s.

18. Prof. Moses Stuart's Philological view of the modern Doctrines of Geology, an Scientific Series, No. 2.

18. Life of Lady Ressell, by Mrs Child, ls. 6d. Biographical Series. No. 4.

29. Dr Channing Dissertation on Slavery, ls. 6d.

20. Prof. Ware on Extemporaneous Preaching, ls. Scientific Series, No. 3.

30. Dr Channing on the Character and Writings of Archbishop Fenelon, 6d.

30. Dr Channing on the Life and Character of Napoleon Bonaparte, ls. 3d.

30. Hen. B. Everett's Discourses on the Importance of Scientific Knowledge, ls. 6d.

31. Man 32. Strocking Reynold's Discourses to the Students of the Royal Academy, Parts I. and II. ls. 9d. each.

30. Prof. Hitchcock's Historical and Geological Deluges compared, ls. 3d. and ls. 6d. Scientific Series. No. 4 and 5.

Sand 30. Prof. Hitchcock's Historical and Geological Deluges compared, 1s. 3d. and 1s. 5d. Scientific Serice, No. 4 and 5.
Z. 3d. and 35. Jouffroy's Philosophical Essays, 2s., 1s. 3d., 2s.
Sand 35. Consin's Philosophical Essays, 1s. and 3s.
Sand 15. Consin's Philosophical Essays, 1s. and 3s.
Dr Channing on Self-Culture, immortality, and a Future Life, 1s. 3d.
U. Biographical Sketch of Dr Tholuck, Professor of Theology in the University of Halle. By Professor Park, Andover, 6d.
Prof. Tholuck's Remarks on the Life, Character, and Style of the Apostle Paul, designed as an introduction to the Study of the Pauline Epistics, 1s.
Prof. Tholuck's Sermons on various occasions, 1s. 6d.
Prof. Tholuck's Dermons on various occasions, 1s. 6d.
Prof. Tholuck's Dermons on various occasions, 1s. 6d.
Prof. Tholuck's Dermons on various occasions, 1s. 6d.
Prof. Tholuck's Sermons on various occasions, 1s. 6d.

among the Greeks and Romans, viewed in the light of Christianity, 3s. Dr Ullmann on the Sinless Character of Jesus.

42. Dr Buckert on the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Dead

The Cabinet Library of Scarce and Celebrated Tracts.

Sir J. Mackintosh's Discourse on the Study of the Law of Nature and Nations, 1s. 6d. Hon. Justice Story's Discourse on the Past History, Present State, and Future Prospects of the Law, 1s. 6d.

Prospects of the Law, is. 6d.

Lowman's Argument to prove the Unity and Perfections of God a priori, with an Introduction by the Kev. Dr Pye Smith, is. Theological Series, No. 1.

Sir W. Scott's (Late Lord Stowell) Judgment pronounced in the Consistory Court of London, in the Case of Dalrymple, the Wife, v. Dalrymple, the Husband, 3s.

Sir W. Scott's Judgments pronounced in the Cases of, 1. The Maria; 2. The Gradian State of the Cases of the C a air w. Scott's Juagments paradacted in the the Government of Great Britain in respect to Neutral Nations, 3s.

7. Controversy respecting the Law of Nations; specially relative to Prussia's Attachment of British Funds by way of Reprisal for English Captures, 3s.

8. The Bight Hon. Edmund Burke's Letter to a Noble Lord, 1s. 3d.

9. Warnkonig's Analysis of Savigny's Treatise on the Law of Possession, 1s. 6d.

CLARK'S LIST OF NEW PUBLICATIONS, EDINBUR

GREEK AND ROMAN LITERATUL

(School Edition, with English Notes.)

The History of Herodotus of Halicari in Nine Books; with Prolegomena, Notes, and Emendat ALEXANDER NEGRIS. 2 vols. foolscap 8vo. price 12s. bd.

The text has been carefully collated with Gaisford,

The text has over the following the factor of History—by a Greek—is very nessend also excerbing. Reitz, &c &c.

"This new edition of the Father of History—by a Greek—is very nessend also excerbingly correct."—Quarterly Journal of Education.

"Mr. Negris is a Greek, and he is well known to scholars; and this effather of History does credit to his taste and erudition. He has brought father of History does credit to his taste and erudition. He has brought as the learning of the grammarian, to his task; a the philosopher, as well as the learning of the grammarian, to his task; a much service to the author whom he has published.
"The volumes are nearly and accurately printed."—Gent. Mag.

New Edition, by Mr. NEGRIS.

Findar.—School Edition, with English Notes and various Xenophon's Anabasis.—School Edition, with Eng and various Readings.

. These works have been carefully collated with the proved Editions which have heretofore been published.

A Dictionary of Modern Greek Proverbs English Translation, Explanatory Remarks, and Philolog By ALEXANDER NEGRIS. Professor of Greek I Royal 18mo. price 5s. bd. in cloth.

"Mr. Negris, a modern Greek, has printed a charming little book of verbs. They are well selected, well translated, and pleasantly commer Spectator.

"The work before us is a very clever and useful collection; its author is
"The work before us is a very clever and useful collection; its author is
"The work before us is a very clever and useful collection; its author is skilled in the ancient languages and literature of his country."-Athena

An Inquiry into the State of Slavery an the Romans, from the earliest Period, till the entrai Lombards into Italy. By W. Blair, Esq. Advocate, now Judges of the Ionian Islands. In fc. 8vo. price 6s. bd. in

"This valuable little Treatise belongs to a class of no common occurr recent literature. It is an extremely sensible and scholar-like inquiry into of great interest in Classical Antiquity,—or rather in the general history of —Our-treity Review.

Whatever industry could gather from all available sources of informa piled in this valuable work.—New Monthly Magazine.

Compendium of the Literary History of until the formation of the Modern Italian Language; transl the Italian of Count F. V. BARBACOVI. 12mo. price 4s. 6

This volume contains a concise but satisfactory vie Literature of Magna Græcia, Sicily, &c. by one of the most scholars of modern Italy. It affords to the student, as well more advanced scholar, a comprehensive manual in a depair Ancient History which has hitherto been only accessible in st minous works as Tiraboschi and others. It embraces a period seventeen centuries.

portant topics have been delineated with force, precision and propriety, several reader will find this work a useful and distinct epitome of Roman it will, to the classical student, prove no less useful as a book of reference Journal.

BIBLICAL CABINET;

OR

HERMENEUTICAL, EXEGETICAL,

AND

PHILOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

VOL. III.

TITTMANN'S SYNONYMS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

EDINBURGH:

THOMAS CLARK, 38, GEORGE STREET;

J. G. & F. RIVINGTON, LONDON;

AND W. CURRY, JUN. & CO. DUBLIN.

ALLI, JUNE & CO. DEDINA

IDCCCSZZZIII.

.

•

REMARKS

ON THE

SYNONYMS

OF THE

NEW TESTAMENT.

BY

JOHN AUG. HENRY TITTMANN, D.D.

FIRST THEOLOGICAL PROFESSOR IN THE UNIVERSITY OF LEIPSIC.

TRANSLATED BY

THE REV. EDWARD CRAIG, M. A. OF ST. EDMUND HALL, OXFORD.

VOL. I.

EDINBURGH:
THOMAS CLARK, 38, GEORGE STREET.
MDCCCXXXIII.

PRINTED BY J. THOMSON, MILNE SQUARE.

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

THE inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures is either a fact, substantiated by ample testimony, or a miserable fallacy, which should be openly and utterly repudiated, as calculated only to delude. Such, however, is the accumulation of evidence on this point, that the former alternative must be unequivocally admitted by every educated and unprejudiced man; and the latter, or indeed any approximation to a doubt on the subject, entirely renounced. The canonical books of the Old and New Testament are the word of the living God.

This conviction leads at once to the necessity of an accurate interpretation of the Scriptures as a divine record. Men ought not to be satisfied without attaining to a clear comprehension of the substance of God's message. For if it is the word of God, of which there can be no legitimate doubt, then there must exist throughout the whole volume, as the product of one mind, one harmonious meaning consonant with the divine wisdom. And if it be a revelation from God to man, that meaning is intended to be ascertained, and may be ascertained by a diligent and humble application of the right means of knowledge. It ceases to be a revelation as far as it does not reveal, if the difficulty of comprehension lies in the terms of the message itself; and it impugns the divine wisdom to suppose that the impediment to discovering that which God intended to be discovered, is traceable to the mode in which it is expressed.

From these principles it flows that the differences yet existing among men, about the meaning of the inspired Scriptures, are criminal. Men are guilty of these differences of opinion. Had they adopted seriously and fully, and with that reverence for divine authority, which emancipates from prejudice, the right means of understanding that which God has put on record, the supposed discrepancies with which that record has been rashly charged, and the conflicting opinions entertained by different men, as deduced from the same words, would have vanished.

With these views, every work which tends to establish and recommend sound principles of interpretation, should be received with thank-The German critics have done much. Though many of them have been deeply in error, others have deserved the thanks of the Christian world; --- and, among the many valuable treatises which have issued from the German Theological School, few rank higher than the unfinished production of Dr. Tittmann now presented to the English public. It proceeds, with great judgment, on the soundest principles of interpretation; and, in the course of an inquiry, conducted under the guidance of very superior acumen and erudition, it not only throws a valuable light on many passages of Scripture, but, which is peculiarly desirable as a part of the series of the Biblical Cabinet, it exhibits a very excellent example of the mode in which judicious, ripe, and well-trained scholars approach the sacred fountain of truth. And while, in many instances, it brings out satisfactorily the peculiar force of the passage under discussion, it presents, collaterally, strong presumptive evidence, drawn from the extraordinary accuracy of the style of the sacred writers, that they were guided in their compositions by a supernatural power.

The object of Dr. Tittmann was to investigate the comparative force of those words in the New Testament which appear to be synonymous, i. e. which range under a common genus, as having one generic idea in common; but which have each of them, additional to this, a specific difference of meaning. Of these he has given an extensive list;—and this work, as far as it has gone, consists of enlarged observations upon some of these synonyms. It is deeply to be regretted that the completion of so able and useful a work was prevented by the death of its author.

To illustrate the specific force of each word,

Dr. Tittmann has brought the whole of his extensive erudition, and the accumulated stores of a long life of painful application, to bear upon each successive object of inquiry. He has elicited from other writers, with great felicity, the exact meaning of each word according to the usus loquendi; and he has shown, from sources of illustration altogether unconnected with the sacred writings, that the words used by our Lord, and by his inspired disciples, when taken in their most obviously correct sense, were the best which could have been chosen; and that if any other synonym had been adopted, instead of that which is given, it would not so accurately have expressed the intended idea.

A work so conducted and so remarkably effective, though it has been broken off in the midst, is a most valuable example to others who profess to interpret the Scriptures. It is "a pattern of well-doing." Many persons, it is to be lamented, approach very rashly the interpretation of the word of God, with very inadequate preparation for it, and with little more specific thought on the subject than a ruling wish to find there the opinions which, under other influences, they have previously adopted. There are men, who have been regularly drilled in the creeds and catechetical exercises of the Calvinistic or the Arminian schools of theology, to whom this remark applies. Their religious opinions are not drawn fresh from the living spring. They are rather the stamp and impress of those formularies, under the cramping pressure of which their minds rose to a stunted maturity. They have walked the round of a certain train of theological thought. They have acquired the conviction, that certain formal dogmas are proved by certain texts, and they can fluently quote these common places in their regular routine. But this system is a barrier to improvement. Its disciples scarcely ever escape from the shackles of such an education. The genuine force of the Word is often repressed by it; and hidden by the interpretation of earlier and less enlightened days, authoritatively bound upon it. And the more accurate meaning, which might otherwise have been evident to men of such scholastic attainment, can never make its way against this rigid habit of interpreting according to the authorized human rule of faith.

There are others, however, who are less endowed with learning and critical acumen. but who have either imbibed the narrow views of some modern particular sect, or sectarian leader; or who have been thrown loose from a reverence for any systematic views of narrated truth; and who seem to regard the Scriptures as the sands of an African river, in which truth lies scattered like so many unconnected grains of gold, and from whence each day's labour is to bring forth some new and independent discovery. To them the laws of interpretation are fetters not to be endured; the same word, repeated even in the same sentence, does not necessarily retain the same sense; and, however a passage may be distorted, if it can be made to accord with the favourite fancy of the moment, this meaning is given forth with all the solemnity of an oracle.

Now to both classes of students here described, and especially to the young, who may be unwittingly led to adopt the habits of either of these objectionable schools, the strict and steady perusal of Tittmann's work may be very It will give them practical experience of the nature of sound interpretation. It will show them the character of mind best fitted for such inquiry, and the judgment and caution, and extensive and accurate reading, with which first-rate minds approach a task so intensely interesting and important. place before them some of the successful results to which inquiries, so conducted, lead. And, in fact, a serious study of these few chapters may, with the divine blessing, lead to an enlarged and accurate investigation of the canon of revealed truth, and to a satisfactory conviction of the substance of its announcements, not drawn from the dogmatic assertions of human authority, or based on the inventions of an exuberant fancy; but flowing legitimately and clearly, from a well-directed grammatical exegesis of the averments of the inspired book itself.

On the immediate subject of the work, as far as it has gone, it would have been presumption in the translator to have added any thing from his own limited resources. On some collateral topics a few notes have been appended. And, on one point, which the learned author has scarcely touched, but which appeared to him materially to strengthen and confirm Dr. Tittmann's views, the translator has added, occasionally, a more enlarged annotation. He has endeavoured to extend the inquiry into the force of a word, beyond the immediate use of it at the time when the New Testament was written, to an anterior period, when the same word existed in an earlier language, and in a different character.

Ernesti says truly, (Biblical Cabinet, p. 27,) that "the usage of language is affected by many things, by the time, the religion, the sect or party, the habits of ordinary life, and the political institutions, all of which tend to form the character of the style." And that "the proper province of grammarians, the highest exercise of their art, consists in discovering what is the exact meaning of each word, at different times, in different authors, and in different styles." It is evident then, that even during the period in which one language flourishes, changes may and do occur in the meaning of words, and by the introduction of new words, derivative or otherwise. Hence an examination of the whole history and progress of the word in that one language becomes necessary to bring out an accurate result. But it must be ever remembered, that each language is not a separate and independent existence. Each successive nation of the earth was originally a migrating colony, which brought a language with them; and even after they were settled, their thinly peopled shores were still open to the ingress of other adventurers, the peculiarities of whose speech would blend with those of the earlier colonists. The English language is an illustration of this It is a compound of Celtic, Gothic, Roman, Saxon, Danish, and French, and necessarily, therefore, extends a scientific investigation of the language into those which were spoken by the successive invaders of our island. And from this it will appear, that etymology is nothing more than an extension of the inquiry, which Ernesti proposes, over a wider range of time and space. It is, in fact, tracing the history of the word, the original idea, and its various changes of form and modifications of thought, through the whole period of its existence, from the people among whom it is first discovered, down to more modern times.

Doubtless, in a multitude of cases, evidence may be adduced of a word having undergone, from custom or accidental influence, a very important modification in its force; though it is scarcely in the nature of things that such changes should occur arbitrarily and without a traceable reason; and such variations are much less frequent and extensive than some persons imagine. But, in the pursuit of philological inquiries, when a word occurs but rarely in surviving writings, and real difficulty arises from the scantiness of the contemporary evidence, in fixing the precise force of the word at the period required, it is surely a matter of great moment to be able to show what was the meaning of the same word in ages anterior to the period under discussion, and what is the meaning or derivation of that word still extant in modern languages or dialects.

Ernesti admits this in some measure. says, "There may be a deficiency of evidence as to the usus loquendi in the particular age and author." (P. 80.) And he suggests, in such difficulties, among other aids, a consideration of "the analogy subsisting between similar languages, that is, between those which have sprung from a common origin, as the Hebrew, the Chaldee, the Syriac, the Arabian; or like those which stand in the relation of parent or derivative, as the Greek and Latin." But the remedy is here timidly proposed. Ernesti does not take a full view of the subject. Has the Greek no parent? Did that copious and well-arranged language, with all the beauties of its grammatical inflexion, spring up at once, and independently, from the Hellenic soil, a host of armed men? If we can trace the progress of Greek to the Italian shore, may we not trace back the Greek to something else?

Is the progress of language, anterior to the formation of the Greek, so completely involved in obscurity, that we can discover no connection between the language of the Hellenic colonists and that of their Asiatic ancestors, whose language we know to have been a written language before Greek had a being?

Fair and cautious investigation shows, beyond all question, that although the radical words of the Greek language have undergone considerable metamorphosis, they have their source in the languages spoken directly to the eastward of the Grecian territories; and that the etymons of Greek and Latin words are found in abundance in the roots of Hebrew and its cognate dialects. And, in fact, the connection between the language spoken by the different divisions of the Shemitic and Japhetic tribes, emigrating westward, is so evident, that they may all be regarded as dialects emanating from one common source, which may still be recognized as the basis of all European languages.

In the 12th vol. of the Encyclopædie Moderne, there is a short treatise on Etymology, by M. Champollion Figeac, which speaks of such inquiries as of great importance to literature, and in which he states the principles on which the investigation should be conducted. and without which it must be vain. "Ignorer ces regles," he says, "c'est vouloir analyser chimiquement une substance solide en la brisant a coups de marteau." The substance of the rule on which he proceeds in the etymological analysis of words in present use, is to detach all grammatical terminations, and initial augments, as prepositions, &c. to strip the word of all additions or alterations made for the sake of euphony; and then he affirms, that when any word has been subjected to this process, there will generally remain a monosyllable of two or three letters, which constitute the radical word.

If, then, this mode of analysis which M. Champollion recommends, be adopted, it will be found that the great proportion of words in modern language are directly referrible to an oriental source; and that the radical word so denuded is oriental. Champollion gives, as an instance, the word Individuellement; ment, an adverbial termination, elle an adjectival termination, in the negative proposition, di the sign of separation. There remains then only vidu or idu; and this probably comes from video, which is udw, idw, with the prefixed digamma, and this leads us at once to the Hebrew yr to know, or perceive.

Take another instance: unencumbered. ed is a participial termination, en is formative of certain verbs, un is the negative prefix, in is a preposition. After this denudation, there remains only cum; which is the Hebrew p, to rise up, or to raise up; and which word is still retained even in its simple form in our language; coom, a heap, and comb, the erection of bees. French combler, Latin cumulus.

We might pursue this to any extent. But the evidence goes beyond this. It may be shown, that very many oriental words of early origin have retained the same sense in several languages throughout the period of this world's history; and that their progress, down to the present time, may be distinctly traced. We must be limited here to one or two instances.

Dy, in Hebrew; darkness, evening, the raven. In this sense, also, the word occurs in Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic. We meet with it in Greek, ερεβος, vesper, nox, caligo, and ερεφω, tego, whence the German, grabe, and English, grave. In the Latin it occurs as corvus, Saxon, crav, English, crow, French, corbeau. Again, in another form, it appears in Saxon, hraefin, English, raven; and then it branches out, from the habits of the bird, into Saxon, hraefian, to raven, to rob; German, rauben; Belgic, rooven; Swedish, rofwa; old Latin, reffare; rapere, rapina; English, rob, rape, rapine, &c. &c.

Another instance may be given in the word Lord, which word occurs in Hebrew and all its cognate dialects, in the sense to absorb, to swallow, to devour; vorax, edax, gula. In Gothic, and in all the families of the Gothic migration, it occurs in the form, balg, venter, scortum, saccus. In the Celtic family also, balg, bolg, builg, meaning venter, saccus, uterus, and balgum, sorbitio. In Latin, bulga, a bag, a budget. In English, a bag, a boil, a blain, (Scottice) a bealing; to bilge, to bulge, to bulk, to blow, to bellow. In Latin bellua, balaena, Greek, βελονη and φαλανα, French baleine. In Latin, polluo, Greek βέβήλος, σαλλαχή, &c. &c.

Examples of this kind might be multiplied to any extent. The gradual course of a word may be traced as an historic fact through several languages, in which the original generic sense has always controlled the specific signification throughout a series of ages. And it must be evident that, in discussing the force of synonyms, much assistance may be derived from a cautious reference to such sources of illustration. If two synonymous words are under consideration, and the evidence in favour of the usus loquendi is but scanty, and intimates, without effectually establishing, the fact of a difference: it is a matter of no little moment, to be able to trace the word in question up to the earliest known period of its existence, and down to its remaining derivatives in modern times; and to show that the idea entertained, as that which was justified by the usage, is comfirmed by the generic character and force of the word at all times; and probably also that the specific use of it, which is sought to be established, did exist in another line of migration from the east than the Hellenic.

To this point, then, the Translator has ventured to apply a few observations, not because he aspires to associate any remarks of his with the pages of such a writer as Tittmann; but because this systematic application of etymological inquiry to exegesis, has not yet been adequately tried; and because experience teaches him that much may yet be done by this means, to illustrate difficult passages of Scripture. If the valuable glossaries of ancient and modern languages, of which we are possessed, are examined, with a view to this mode of illustration, treasures of invaluable importance may yet be brought forth; which, under the guidance of sound and well-weighed canons of application, may throw much new light upon rare words and obscure passages, both in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. And if these few hints shall turn the attention of superior linguists to the subject, the Translator will not regret the intrusion of his own views on the public through the medium of these prefatory remarks. The subject is extensive, and the matter for illustration abundant, and requiring ample space for detail. Here, however, it should not be carried further.

Mr. Tittmann completed, before his death, another small portion of this work on the Synonyms. This, together with some other small tracts, on subjects intimately connected with the present treatise, it is the purpose of the Translator to give to the public at a future period.

The second volume also will include a general list of the Synonyms of the New Testament, which was arranged by Tittmann, and printed with short notices attached occasionally to some of the words.

EDINBURGH, March 1, 1833

MEMOIR

OF

DR. TITTMANN.

ABRIDGED FROM THE GERMAN.

DR. John Augustus Henry Tittmann, was born on the 1st of August 1773, at Langersalza, in Upper Saxony, at which place his father was then stationed as deacon in the church of St. Boniface. He was in infancy extremely delicate, but his health gradually improved, especially after the removal of his father to Wittenberg. Here his education commenced, and his progress was rapid. At fifteen years of age he gave the first public proof of his talents in an essay, "De Virgilio Homerum imitante." Enjoying the privilege of such teachers as Schröck, Antoni, Henrichs, Hiller, and especially the illustrious Reinhard, he pursued his studies successfully, taking the degree of M. A. in 1791. And in the year following, having determined to devote himself to an academical life, he went to Leipsic and studied under Professors Morus, Rosenmuller. Keil and Wolf. In 1793, he defended from the chair a dissertation entitled, " De Consensu Philosophorum veterum in summo bono definiendo," and in the following month opened his first course of lectures. In 1795, he was made B. D. and was appointed to be the morning preacher at the University Church. prelections to the theological students were so very much approved, that, in the year 1796, he was appointed to an extraordinary professorship of Philosophy; and in 1800 to a similar one in theology. In 1805, being just thirtytwo years of age, he took the degree of doctor in divinity, and was admitted into the concilium professorum; and having thus obtained a vote in the Theological faculty, he had the means of being useful to his pupils, of which he readily availed himself for those who merited his favour.

On the death of Dr. Wolf in 1809, he was appointed the third regular professor of the University. In 1812, he became the assessor of the royal consistory. In 1815, he succeeded Rosenmuller as the second professor, and canon of Meissen; and on the death of Dr. Keil in 1818, he rose to the very honourable position of Academiae professor primarius; and having passed also through the various intermediate grades of ecclesiastical honour, he was elected the Custos prelatus of the cathedral church at Meissen. These successive steps of honourable elevation, present to us a very striking instance of the steady progress to respect and usefulness, of a man of real worth and talent. It is remarkable also, that in all these several stations, his talent for business was as eminent as his theological attainments. He was ever, in the midst of an active devotion to the most complicated duties, the ready counsellor of his pupils in all their various doubts and difficul-His advice also was sought with much avidity in the filling up of ecclesiastical and academical charges; and such was his accurate discernment of character, that he had scarcely ever reason to regret his recommendation.

XXVIII MEMOIR OF DR. TITTMANN.

In the several stations which he held, Dr. Tittmann continued to lecture, during: a period of forty years, on various branches of theological study. He gave courses of lectures on the exegesis of the New Testament, on the method of theological study, on church history, on the evidences, the morality, the creeds, and the dogmanic system of Christianity, all of which were highly valued.

His system of exegesis led directly to the bringing out the meaning from the sacred text itself, independently of all consideration of the opinions of commentators. His course of lectures on the method of study extended through a period of seven years. The views contained in his lectures on Church History, are given to the world in his admirable work, called, "A Practical Exposition of the Evangelical Churches in the years 1530 and 1830."

^{*} Der Evangelische Kirche in Jahre 1530, und in Jahre 18:0, pragmatisch dargestellt.

A very valuable tract from his pen on the same subject, appeared a few weeks before his death in the Journal of Historical Theology. In his lectures on the evidences of Christianity, he made use of a small work, entitled, "Thoughts on the Subject of a Defence of the Faith."b His lectures on morals were deeply interesting; and nothing could be more beautiful than the simplicity of his teaching in dogmatic theology. It is to be regretted that a projected work on this subject, which he had commenced six times, but, in consequence of the difficulty of satisfying the rigid demands of his own accurate mind, had as often laid aside, was never completed. A few days before his death, he had mentioned his intention of devoting himself to it in the following spring.

In his lectures on "the Creeds," he used, as a text-book, his "Institutio Symbolica Ecclesias Evangelicae," Lips. 1811. In the course of these prelections, he taught his pupils to entertain a due, but only a due regard for creeds, as human standards of religious opinion. And he drew, with delicate accuracy, the distinctions between the Lutheran creed and that of other churches.

b Ideen zu einer Apologie des Glaubens.

Tittmann's ability as a lecturer was admitted by all who heard him. His manner was good, his style lucid and simple, and his readiness for extempore address great. He was remarkable also for his constant attention to the interests of his students, and for his great liberality, both with respect to the fees of the class, and the devotion of his time to the society of his students out of the class-room.

The works of Tittmann are not very extensive. They contain, however, much of the fruits of forty years of labour; often giving, in a few sentences, matter which others would have expanded into a volume. And in addition to those productions, which were strictly professional, he wrote many tracts and pamphlets on ecclesiastical law. He contributed papers to the Antiquarian Society, and regularly, from the year 1822 to 1831, he wrote the preface to the Leipsic Missionary Report.

Dr. Tittmann was, according to the German technical style of speaking, a supernaturalist; and, however some of his views might for a short time, and by some persons be misunderstood, he was decidedly opposed to what is on the continent of Europe called Rationalism. He drew the distinction calmly and wisely between the departments of reason and religious submission to divine teaching. vindicated the proper province of reason in judging of religious, as of all other truth; and maintained that the reason cannot receive, as true, any thing which is really opposed to the eternal and universally recognized laws of truth, which God has given for man's general He held, therefore, that there was guidance. in Christianity nothing contrary to these laws and to sound reason. At the same time, he held it vain to affirm, that the statements of a religious dispensation were limited to matters which the human mind, by the force of its natural faculties, might have ascertained; but that, besides the natural exercise of the reasoning powers for the discovery of truth, there is still another source of religious knowledge, viz. the special teaching of the Infinite reason; by means of which the finite created mind may receive truths with which formerly it was unacquainted; that the Infinite mind, acting in the same way as we conceive him to act in his providential government, has, in the development of his purposes towards his creature man, from time to time made known certain religious truths; that this is the revelation of God; that it is in the Christian system; and that it must be regarded as a supernatural revelation, and is properly called so, because its ultimate source is not nature, but the immediate teaching of that being who, in other respects, operates ordinarily and regularly through the laws of nature; and that consequently it were vain and absurd to attempt to base the doctrines of Christianity on metaphysical subtleties; and that the only wise and safe course is to hold stedfastly by the teaching of Christ and his Apostles.

XXXH MEMOIR OF DR. TITTMANN.

The habits of Dr. Tittmann were of course rigidly studious and industrious. He rose in his youth at four, and in later years at five, in the morning. The morning hours he passed till nine in his study. He then went to his class-room, where he taught till twelve. From twelve to one he wrote letters and read the papers. He dined early, and took a short rest. At three he received visitors. From four to six he attended various literary societies; and then hastened again to his desk, at which he generally sat till eleven.

He married a widow lady in the year 1811, by whom he had three children, two of whom still live.

The outward frame of Tittmann was worthy to be the tabernacle of such a spirit as his. Benevolence beamed to the last from his blue and speaking eye; and his whole figure was noble and commanding. Dr. Tittmann died of consumption, combined with other local affections. His general health began to wear a suspicious character in the month of October. yet, contrary to medical advice, he persisted in being carried in a sedan chair to the classroom, and continued to lecture three hours daily, until the 2d of December. From that day his strength rapidly failed, yet he only ceased from labour on the 23d, because his hands were too weak to hold the pen, and an inflammatory seizure in the throat prevented him from dictating. He died on the 30th. In the close of his illness he said one day, "I am a philosopher and a theologian, but never did I perceive so distinctly as now, that soul and body are two distinct things." Towards the evening of the 29th, he called for a mirror, saying, "I suspect I have got the facies hippocratica." During the evening he seemed to dream: and, in a plaintive accent, he said, "All I have now to do is to sleep." He revived a little, however, and in his last moments he imagined himself in the chair lecturing to his pupils; he repeated the words with which he frequently concluded: "Sed haec sufficiant; finis, finis in fide;" and so saying, he fell asleep.

XXXIV MEMOIR OF DR. TITTMANN.

. 44

Happy and worthy of imitation, a life so actively and unremittingly devoted to the service of God, and the elucidation of his inspired word. And blessed they, who, according to their several ability, shall go and do likewise.

List of the Author's works.

Grundriss der Elementar Logik, nebst einer Einleitung in die philosophie. Leipzig, 1795.

Theocles ein Gespräch über den Glauben an Gott. Leipzig, 1799.

Theon oder über unsere Hoffnungen nach dem Tode. Leipzig, 1801.

Lehrbuch der Homiletik. Breslau, 1804.

Pragmatische Geschichte der Theologie und Religion in der Protestantischen Kirche, während der Zweiten Hälfte des 18 Jahrhunderts Erstes Theil. Breslau, 1805.

De rebus academicis epistola ad virum summe reverendum perillustrem et excellentissimum Gottl. Adolph. Ernest. Nostitz et Taenkendorf. Lipsiæ

XXXVI LIST OF THE AUTHOR'S WORKS.

- Ueber Supranaturalismus Rationalismus et Atheismus. Leipzig 1816.
- Ueber die Vereinigung der Evangelischen Kirchen. Leipzig, 1818.
- Die protestation der Evangelischen Stände auf dem Reichstage zu Speyer im Jahre 1529. Leipzig, 1829.
- Confessio Fidei exhibita Imperatori Charles V. in Comitiis Augustæ, MDXXX. ex primo Melancthonis editione recognita. Dresdæ, 1829.
- Ueber die Fixerung der Stolgebuhren. Leipzig, 1831.

THE

SYNONYMS

OF THE

NEW TESTAMENT.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE ACCURATE DISCRIMINATION OF THE SYNONYMS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

THE anniversary of that day, my beloved fellow-citizens, is arrived, on which, with a view to do away a shameless traffic in indulgences, Luther enkindled a flame, that all but enveloped the dome of St. Peter's. But this flame having declined together with the pontifical sovereignty of Rome, it becomes those Christians whose primitive rights the sacred energy of Luther vindicated, to commemorate that day, not by idle triumphs, but by remembering the wise councils of that great man. It becomes them so to avail themselves of the benefits which he conferred, that they may be seen to have been realized by judicious men, who do not merely boast themselves of their privileges, but use them wisely. course, as it has been often neglected by those who seemed to adhere to Lutheran views, so has it especially been the case with those who. forsaking the study of the interpretation of Scripture, have based their confidence on human forms and ecclesiastical authority, and thus rashly overthrown one of Luther's wisest instructions. For no opinion of Luther was more prominent than that the divine doctrine must be drawn directly from the sacred fount itself; and he therefore especially recommended the art of grammar and the study of the ancient languages; although it is generally supposed that, on account of his own education under a defective system, or from the multiplicity of duties by which he was subsequently overwhelmed, he was, in common with the greatest men of that age, not thoroughly trained to the subtleties of grammar. These subtleties, however, many in our day have learned to despise; and, as if the subject were exhausted, they have turned to sophistical disputation, and have learned to regard the whole business of the grammatic interpreter as lying in determining the vague signification of words, or in seeking out what they call the literal sense, but which they evidently do not understand. Of this folly, however, I will not now speak, as it is sufficiently evident that after such an improvement in letters as that which has recently taken place, the inertion of these men will scarcely be longer endured. But on that day which we are about to celebrate, it will be gratifying to all to whom the divine doctrine and discipline are precious, to remember that saying which was ever in the mouth of Luther: the best grammarian is the best theologian; that is, he who not only knows the principles of the ancient languages, but also so perceives the general art of speaking,than which nothing more sublime has been invented by the human mind,—to be reducible to common rules naturally based in reason, so that he is able rightly to expound all the memorials of talent, and to open the fathomless treasuries of human erudition, he is certainly best fitted to ascertain and to impart to others sacred truth. He is sadly mistaken who measures the business of the interpreter by the vulgar mode of speaking, as if he had nothing to do but what boys learn at school. Although even the elementary rules of grammar are not to those entering the interior of even this art, many subtle distinctions will appear, which are not only fitted to exercise the acumen of opening minds, but to test even the science and eradition of the best informed men. But most truly Hemsterhusius has said, to understand a language, that is, according to the common notion, to get all the words and forms of speech packed close in the brain, appears but an idle and profitless attainment. (See his Oration on uniting the Study of Mathematics and Philosophy with that of the Linguistic Art.)

But while many things in respect to the grammatical interpretation of the New Testament require a nicer accuracy than is generally thought necessary; this is especially true of those words commonly called synonyms; so that, unless the most accurate thought has been exercised on them, it is much to be feared that no language whatever can be thoroughly understood. For that which, in the study of language, is regarded as the highest attainment, viz. to know whence, and for what reasons, certain names were given to certain things, is of such a nature that it cannot be attained without the accurate examination of synonymous terms; neither can an interpreter remain ignorant of the origin and reason of them, unless he is himself willing to err in respect to the notions of things so expressed in words, or carelessly to acquiesce in loose analogous significations, however rendered. That this nicety, however, in discriminating and explaining synonyms is yet wanting, both in many interpreters of the New Testament, and in almost all our Lexicons, is not surprising. For this is in all languages the most difficult branch of study, and the least elaborated; and is, of course, so much more difficult as the times of the rise, perfection, and decline of a language are more remote from our own age; and that, as the foundation and origin of particular words fall into obscurity, the origin and relation of synonyms are less easily discovered. And although in the Greek language especially, on account of the refinement and exuberance of the Greek mind, the accurate discrimination of synonyms is extremely difficult, yet in explaining the writings of the New Testament, the definite marking of cognate and similar words is, on two accounts, attended with still greater difficulty. In the first place, because the customary speech of those writers is more nearly allied to the style of vulgar life than to that of erudite men, which is governed by strict rules; and also that on account of the multitude of new ideas to be expressed by means of words then in use, their task must have been difficult to any one, but especially to those who were strange to the habit of accurate speaking and writing. For the multitude of common minds, if, on the whole, they agree in certain general notions or ideas of things, care not to ascertain accurately what is the force of each word; but make use of similar or analogous terms very promiscuously, and do little more than endeavour to express what they think in the readiest and most accessible terms. And hence they not only do not nicely discriminate between synonyms; but they heap together similar words, the true and nice distinctions between which, even learned men too much neglect. The language of men in common life is certainly more vehement and less modified; its terms are less nicely measured, and it often affirms both indistinctly and rashly; which, if an interpreter lose sight of, he will often be seeking in the force of words for a meaning which never entered the mind of the author: an error far too palpable in most of the interpreters of the New Testament. But, in explaining the sacred volume, the other point which we have noticed is not less important. For these writers, in expressing new things, for which, in common parlance, suitable words were wanting, made use of analogous words which would be clear and perspicuous to the men to whom they wrote, but which certainly present difficulty to others who are estranged from their modes and habits of thinking. For in respect to things of which a people have no notion, there must be in their language a want of words or signs for them; and therefore if their range of knowledge is to be increased by new notions of new things, either new words must be coined, which ordinarily takes place in those things which strike the senses; or foreign words must be borrowed, which is frequently done; or the new idea is expressed as it best may, in analogous words then extant, whether in a simple or tropical sense. And that the Apostles have done this is no marvel, and surely not a ground of blame, seeing that the greatness and sublimity of the truths they taught,-truths mightier than the fetters of language-could not endure the regulated precision of established modes of speech. explaining their writings, extreme caution is required, lest the interpreter, in rendering cognate and analogous words differing minutely from each other, should attribute to them the same sense, when they are used in a different one; or should attach importance to the difference of sense, when they did not intend to do so. And truly this requires more caution than those who despise the niceties of grammar are willing to exercise; and hence it is, that in explaining the books of the New Testament, words which differ widely in meaning are assumed to be synonymous, while others which are allied to one common notion, are not explained with sufficient accuracy. And that I do not here speak unadvisedly, I will now endeavour to demonstrate.

But, at the outset, we must determine what synonyms are. For many have written only ambiguously and defectively on this point; and neither Ammonius, Popma, or others, who have written on "similar or dissimilar expressions," have adequately discussed the nature of synonyms. The philologists of our own country, who seem, by nature, fitted beyond

^a A writer of the fourth century. His work, De Similitudine ac differentia quarundam dictionum, was published at Paris, 1521, and London, 1637.—T.

b See Ausonius Popma de differentiis verborum item de usu antiquae locutionis. Lipsiae, 1734.—T.

all others, for the examination of such difficulties, have thrown the first light on this subject. Among these, after Stosch, Fischer, and Adelung, Eberhard is admitted to stand pre-eminent. We yet admire, however, the superior mind of Aristotle, who defined so subtilely and elegantly the notions of indefinite things, that he has given us a most perfect example of accurate speaking and thinking. He says, συνώνυμα, δν τό, τε δνομα ποινόν, παι ό πατά τοῦνομα λόγος τῆς οὐσίας ό αὐτός. οίον ζῶον, ο, τε ἄνθεωπος και ὁ βοῦς. Synonyms, therefore, according to Aristotle, are those things which, having by nature a common genus, are called by a common name. these he distinguishes ὁμώνυμα, which, though possessing a different nature, have a common generic name, οδον ζῶον ἄνθεωπος και το γεγεαμμένον τούτων γάρ ὄνομα μόνον κοινόν, ο δε κατά τοῦνομα λόγος τῆς οὐσίας ἔτερος (ante Categor. § 1, 2.) Whence ^{} Far otherwise speaks Dionysius Thrax (See Bekkeri Anecdot. vol. ii. p 636.) ὁμώνυμόν ἐστιν ὅνομα, τὸ κατὰ πολλῶν ὁμωνύμως τιθίμινον, οἶον Αἴας ὁ Τελαμώνιος καὶ Αἴας ὁ 'Οἴλίως, μῦς Βαλάσσιος καὶ μῦς γηγενής. Συνώνυμον δί ἐστι τὸ ἐν διαφόςοις ἐνόμασι τὸ αὐτὸ δηλοῦν, οἶον ἄος, ξίφος, μάχαιςα, σπάθη, φάσγανον. But the Scholiasts (ibid p. 867,) appear to differ, unless we examine them very accurately. Certainly grammarians say that the ὁμώνυμα is a word common to diverse persons or things,

A grammarian resident at thodes, a disciple of Aristarchus, and who, according to Suidas, published some grammatical works.—T.

it appears, that he called those things synonyms which bore a common generic name, and had in them also the same reason why the name was given. And so far the definition is good; for it correctly intimates what they have in common. But one point is yet unnoticed, viz: that synonyms differ, and in what they differ. And, although this is almost an endless subject; for synonyms differ in as many ways as there is room for distinctions in the same word; yet this must not be lost sight of, lest synonyms be confounded with words of precisely similar power and meaning. For it is to be understood, that synonyms are words of the same genus, but of different species, in which fact especially the nature of synonyms lies; but, since all the species are not of the same mode, for some are subject directly to the genus, and others to the species, it becomes necessary to explain accurately both the affinities and the differences which exist. Eustathius (on Iliad. 8, 20.) has spoken more fully, and it is as well to quote as Alas, μῦς, πύων, φοῖτζ. but that the συώνυμα, is a similar signification conveyed by diverse words, δ διά πλιώνων διομάτων Γι ὑποπίμενον σημαίνει, δίστες οἱ Περιπατητικοὶ πολυώνυμα λίγουσε. They differ, therefore, from Aristotle, who says that synonyms are not terms peculiar to a genus, but names of things ranged in one common genus.

his words, for Henry Stephen does not appear to have rightly caught his meaning. SAVS, ἐπὶ τῶν παροξυνομένων ἀνθρώπων, τέσσαρα ταῦτα Légeral evépara maga roi month. Jupés yéles phos phons κότος δι Δυμός μει και χόλος ταυτά έστιν ώσπες και ή ποινότερον μεθ' "Ομηρον λεγομένη δργή· παλ sidi τὰ τρία ταύτα, ο θυμός ο χόλος και ή όγγη συνώνυμα κατά τούς γραμματικούς κατά δε τους άλλους πολυώνυμα καθά και τό βροτός μέροψ άνθρωπος. — και ούτω μέν χόλος και δργή και θυμός πολυωνυμούσιν έν ταυτότητι σημασίας. These words very accurately express that which constitutes the nature of synonyms, viz: a certain notion common to several words, in each of which a certain specific difference resides; as there are four species of δεχή, θυμός χόλος μηνις x6ros, all which may be predicated of an angry man; but yet in each there is something by which it may be distinguished from the others. If, therefore, we regard the grammarians, synonyms are words contained under the same genus, but each of which has its peculiar species; so that, though they are all comprehended under one common notion, vet each has besides its distinguishing peculiarity.

Synonyms are, however, of two kinds, of which the one may be called logical, the other grammatical. And we would call those logical, in which there is a diverse notion of the forms or species which class under the same genus; as in the example cited from Eustathius, deyn is the genus, but the several species are Jupis χύλος μημς κότος diverse certainly in their specific nature, but cognate in one common and more general quality; for all may be predicated of an angry man. We call these logical synonyms, because their relation lies in the reason of the thing, which interlinks many things with a common name or thing; or, as Aristole says, δτι ο αὐτός ἐστιν ο κατά τοὔνομα τῆς οὐσίας λόγος. But there are other synonyms which the older grammarians appear to have called πολυώνυμα, the synonyms of things, which, on various accounts, are called by various names, as Beorfe μέροψ ἄνθρωπος. These, as they differ, not in the notion of the thing expressed, but merely in the reason of the particular term given, may be called grammatical synonyms, unless some should prefer to call them etymological. For often many terms are appropriated to the same thing, which differ only in the etymology; as the same men are called, in a different relation, άνθρώποι, βροτοι, μέροπες. But, if any one maintains that such words should be excluded from the list of synonyms, I shall not object; since properly, those things only are synonymous which have, in fact, the same name as subjects to the same genus. And in this sense later writers have used the term. But since. to both kinds of words, this is common, that they are the signs of things which possess in common one generic distinction, they would not be altogether incorrectly called synonyms, by any one who wished to comprehend under one term this whole genus of cognate vocables. This, however, must not be conceded, that words which signify the same thing in the same mode, are to be accounted synonyms. For how many have erred who have classed together the συνώνυμα and iσοδυναμοῦντα. It is one thing to signify in some way the same object, it is another to have the same force, that is precisely the same meaning. Nor does Aquila Rom.d (de συνωνυμία) speak altogether unadvisedwhen he says, we avail ourselves of this kind of elocution, when we consider one word not to express sufficiently the dignity and greatness of the subject; and, therefore, introduce others having the same signification. it is a very different matter what the Scholiast on Aristophanes says, έθος τοῖς ποιηταῖς παραλλήλοις λέξεσιν Ισοδυναμούσαις χεησθαι. (vid. Ioh. Chr. G.

^d I suppose the author means Peter de Aquila, or Aquilanus, who wrote, in 1737, a book, Questiones in quatuor libros sententiarum.—T.

Ernesti Lexicon Technol. Graec. Rhetor. p. 334.) More correctly J. A. Ernesti, the ornament of this university, taught in his Institutio Interpretis N. T., that "in the same language, or, at least, in the same dialect of it, among the same people, during the same age, there are no synonyms of words specifically applied; if, however, such exist in any language, they are the product of different dialects or periods." This remark is true, and worthy of much attention, if synonyms are to be regarded as equivalent words; the number of which will always be few in any language in proportion to its refinement, as in Greek; for it may be fairly doubted, whether in a language so far refined, any words can be found of precisely the same force, i. e. which indicate the same thing, precisely in the same way; for although they may denote the same thing, as βασιλεύς, αναξ rbeauvos, or may signify the several species of the same genus, as ξίφος, ἄος, φάσγανον, yet they differ in certain points; and, although the traces of this difference may be, by length of time and indiscriminate use, almost obliterated; yet they may be recovered from accurate writers, and can even be followed out by means of the etymology itself. Wherefore, great care should be taken, lest in words of this kind, which seem to mean the same thing, we neglect the specific difference of meaning; and this especially in terms which relate to merals and to the affections of the mind; which, although they may appear very nearly allied, yet in degree, or mode, or in specific character, may, nevertheless, differ very widely. And this is, in fact, one of the most fruitful sources of synonyms.

[•] See Biblical Cabinet, vol. i. p. 50.- T.

And hence, therefore, both in other books, and in the books of the New Testament, those words only can be regarded as synonyms, which have the same common notion, to which several species or modes are subjected; so that they may be all referred to the same generic head; but each, at the same time, so distinctly differing that, as species, they may be accurately distinguished from the genus itself.

There are, however, three kinds of words especially in the New Testament, which may be erroneously taken for synonyms; and concerning these I will speak shortly. The first class consists of those which signify either the cause or the effect; and are so much more likely to be regarded as synonyms, because the writers of the New Testament, as is very common in popular writing, are wont to unite very closely cause and effect. For example, writers of dogmatic theology are very apt to use promiscuously those words which are applied by the sacred writers to the redemption of man, as ίλασμός λύτρον έξαγορασμός δικαίωσις καταλλαγή· ἄφισις άμαρτιῶν; so that these words appear to signify precisely the same thing, or, at all events, to be synonymous. And the three former we might grant to be synonyms, although, even then, their specific difference should be noticed; but the others which follow differ widely from them. For these denote the effects of the work of Christ-those benefits which flow through Christ to the real believer; while the cause or reason why such benefits are referred to Christ as their author, is expressed by those words, which show what Christ has done. For when the sacred writers say that Christ accomplished, ιλασμός, λύσχον, έξαγορασμός, they mean to express that which he did to obtain καταλλαγή, δικαίωσις, ἄφεσις άμαςτιῶν. Δικαίωσις is the effect of εξαγορασμός and so is the παταλλαγή, and they who have considered it as synonymous with iλασμός have greatly erred. For the xarallayn is not referred to God, but to men: it is the effect of the idagues and the ἄφισις άμαρτιῶν. For after that men have obtained, through Christ, the assured hope of pardon and future happiness, nothing hinders their return to a state of gracious favour with God; and, that lifted up and encouraged by that hope, they should both cease to dread any thing from God towards themselves, and cease to act contrary to his will. And although men are said to be "enemies by wicked works," the force of this is not that God is angry with them; although, on account of his perfect holiness, he cannot approve of human perverseness, nor grant to man a salvation for which he is utterly unfit; but it is, that, men alienated from the love of virtue, and struggling against the sanctity of the divine laws, are in their thoughts, their course of life, and even in their fear, opposed to the will of God, and are in despair of attaining a happy end; than which, nothing can render man, who is "sold under sin," more wretched.f But from this benefit which is ref This is a most important theological dogma, brought out and illustrated by accurate scholarship. It lies at the basis of useful evangelical instruction. That which divines have called the law-enmity on the part of God towards men, has been made too much of by some, in the face of the Gospel announcement, that "God was, in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, and not imputing to men their trespasses." If men are to be encouraged to seek a better state, they must be shown, that the impediment does not lie in the religious system, but in their own wilful indifference and mistrust.....T.

ferred to Christ, it follows that man may be reconciled to God. The ἄφεσις ἀμαφτιῶν, precedes, and then follows the χαταλλαγή· Because θεδς ἦν ἐν χριστῷ πόσμον καταλλάσσων ἐαυτῷ, μὴ λογιζόμενος αὐτοῖς τὰ παραπτώματα αυτῶν it is now the duty of men to return to a state of grace with a holy God. δεόμεθα οῦν ὑπὲς χριστοῦ, καταλλάγητε τῷ θεῷ (2 Cor. v. 19, 20.)

In the same way, δικαίωσις and ἄφεσις αμαιτιών are improperly regarded as synonyms. For dixaíwois is the whole gift of salvation; but the ἄφεσις ἀμαςτίῶν is the cause and necessary condition by which the diraiwois exists. Many passages show that they thus differ as cause and effect, but those, especially in which they are plainly distinguished as to order of time, as Rom. iv. 25. But as these words have been taken for synonyms, it has, of course, happened that when they ought to be plainly subordinated one to the other, they have been treated as parallel in order, and by this means a serious confusion has been introduced into ideas of the first importance. For not even now, in explaining the substance of the Gospel concerning the salvation accomplished by Christ, and really obtainable by men, do they altogether abstain from those formulae which, taking their rise from the Vulgate rendering of certain words, subsequently, when the Romish Church had obscured the true benefits of the death of Christ, were adopted almost of necessity by our own theologians; and then, at length, contrary to the plain meaning of the sacred writers, were received among the evangelic dogmata, and defended with more zeal than propriety; and even now, are attempted to be justified. If any true evangelical theologian could persuade himself, in explaining the doctrine of salvation, to use words which actually accord with the Greek, and not those uncertain ambiguous terms borrowed from the Vulgate, as justitia, justificatio, satisfactio, &c., he certainly, as doing much to place the evangelic doctrine in its true light, and to defend it from the defilements of its enemies, would deserve much praise.h In the mean time, let us give dili-

⁸ Rather, it is the putting man in such a state before God, forensically, as that all the practical realization of salvation from sin and its consequences shall follow.—T.

h It is almost impracticable to unravel the web which Romish sophistry has woven around the truth to hide it. The ingenuity of ages has been devoted to this subject. For instance, the true notion of repentance has been almost entirely lost, through the false view which the Romanists have promulgated about penance. They have endeavoured to show that the very word comes from poena, punishment, and gence that the words which, in their teaching, the sacred writers have used, be understood in their true force and meaning.

Another class of words in the New Testament which have been mistaken for synonyms, is that of those which express the state or the action. In explaining these, error often is committed, when persons who know not the true force of the words, endeavour to excuse the rashness of their own interpretation by the supposed inaccuracy of diction in the sacred writers; and thus confound those words which express the action with those which denote the state or condition of the thing. And if any one should say that this is of no moment; for that in both words the notion of the same thing is dominant; it is easy to shew how greatly he is deceived. For, in the first place, that penance or repentance is a voluntary infliction for sin. But the fact is, that our word repent, and the French se repentir, are not at all derived from this source, but from the Hebrew word 7725, to turn; and this etymological view of the word brings us away altogether from the false doctrine of Rome, and exhibits to us the idea of repentance in its true light, and in perfect accordance with the New Testament word for it, perancia, a change of mind, a turning from sin to God. From the same source, we have the French word pents, inclination, and in our own language, pent-house, a sloping roof, inclining towards the main building.—T.

the words are of a different genus, and cannot therefore be accounted synonyms; as, for example, creation and the thing created; slaughter and death; who would call these synonyms? Moreover, as the thought is widely different when we speak of a certain action, and when we speak of the state or condition effected by that action, it is inevitable that many errors must arise if words of these different kinds are accounted synonymous. Yet this is a fault so frequent with our lexicographers, that I do not hesitate to affirm it to be a fruitful source of many serious errors. Examples of this may be found in those words especially which have their origin in a common root, as dixalweig, dixaloσύνη, and διχαίωμα, and many others; which, when they are referred to the same thing, are improperly regarded as synonyms, and are therefore frequently explained as if it were the same thing whether the Apostle had written διχαίωμα or dixaíwoic. And this is still more objectionable when words of this class are used to express important general notions, for the accurate setting forth of which customary language scarcely suffices. For in these cases it must often happen, and most unfortunately for the ascertaining the Apostle's meaning, that words which describe the action are confounded with the idea of the state and condition of the thing acted on; which, in passages where the sacred writers have spoken of the wickedness of the men of their generation not unfrequently occurs.

Finally, the third kind of synonyms which are erroneously assumed to exist in the New Testament, is more difficult of development. It embraces those words which so far signify the same thing, that they equally regard certain persons, or certain times and places, and therefore are falsely assumed to be synonymous, and are not explained as to their specific difference, because a certain general notion is assumed as the basis of them all. There are many such words in the New Testament, which are used only of certain persons or of a certain time or place, each of which express a very different idea, although they have reference to one and the same thing. Such are μετανοείν, έπιστρέφεσθαι, άνωθεν, γεννηθήναι, άγιασθήναι. ατισθήναι, ανακαινοῦσθαι, which, though they are all predicated of amendment of heart and life. yet they exhibit the notion so differently, that they cannot be accounted synonymous. indeed, as μετανοείν, άγιασθήναι, express the common notion of amendment; others, as emioreiφεσθαι, ανωθεν γεννηθήναι, are spoken of a change in the Jews' mode of thinking and acting; the rest, and indeed most words of this class, require the improvement of the manners and life of men already corrupted and defiled by sinful association. And if these words are accounted synonymous, then they are all understood in one sense as of renewing, restoring, and, as it were, forming again human nature, when they ought to be understood of the amendment of the life of men already in existence, and already corrupted; and any one capable of judging, will readily admit the confusion that must thus be introduced. For, although we are not disposed to deny that human nature, even at its best, needs the aid and discipline of the Holy Spirit, that it may obtain a blessed end; nay, we will readily grant that all the posterity of Adam must despair of eternal happiness, unless they steadily pursue that course which the sacred books prescribe, and which is most assuredly pointed out to them by inspiration; yet this also we think evident, that no opinions have been held concerning man's moral state more dreadful, or which ought more justly to be mollified by the favourable use of ambiguous words, than those which apply the Scripture statements, concerning men in a state of actual corruption, to the moral state of human nature itself; and this arises from no other cause than that words, which were affirmed only of certain men in certain places and times, were, as if they involved the same general notion, regarded as synonymous. Certainly this will be granted by all, that a passage concerning man's moral improvement is usually treated as if it spoke indiscriminately of the new-born infant and of the worst man on earth. And we

It is to be feared that the author has, in these latter remarks, allowed the benevolence of his feelings to carry him away from the line of accurate investigation which he prescribes, and in which he generally walks with much caution. The whole of this passage is far too general and loose in its statements, to warrant an almost sceptical view of the established theology of ages, upon some important points of doctrine. We must not receive even upon so respectable an authority, the mere assertion that, imareiquelas and and very yerraffinas are expressions only to denote a change from Judaism to Christianity; nor would it be a sound canon of criticism, that there is an ambiguity in doctrinal terms in the inspired writers, which should be thrown into the scale in favour of man's present moral condition as a fallen being. It is easy for perverted intellect. or unsound scholarship, to assume this ambiguity, and build on it a false and ruinous dogma; and in fact, this is the fruitful source of most heretical opinions; while, before the meridian light of such acumen as that which Mr. Titmann generally shows, all seeming ambiguity vanishes.--T, might easily multiply such examples if we had room, or if more examples were needed to sustain a self-evident observation. So far however I have spoken, lest the errors into which men fall respecting synonyms, should be accounted of little importance. The ills under which we suffer in this respect are undoubtedly curable; but they lie deeper than is generally thought; nor will they be heard till, in compliance with the advice of Luther, we return to the strict accuracy of grammatic investigation.^k idea of the state and condition of the thing acted on; which, in passages where the sacred writers have spoken of the wickedness of the men of their generation not unfrequently occurs.

Lectainly much of the wild theology, which, to the disgrace of the Christian church in the 19th century, has disturbed the peace of its members, may be traced to the ad inaccuracy with which the word of God is read in the original languages. Women and boys, and sometimes men, (see such publications as the Morning Watch, passim) with a little smattering of Greek and Hebrew, set up for critics and inventors of new views; and so extensive is the want of a habit of strict exegetical interpretation, that not many of the pastors of the present day in our country, are prepared by the ponderous metal of a sound scholarship, to confound and silence their frivolous and baseless speculations. The mists which they raise could not live in the light of such writings as this very able work on the synonyms of Scripture.—T.

Finally, the third kind of synonyms which are erroneously assumed to exist in the New Testament, is more difficult of development. It embraces those words which so far signify the same thing, that they equally regard certain persons, or certain times and places, and therefore are falsely assumed to be synonymous, and are not explained as to their specific difference, because a certain general notion is assumed as the basis of them all. There are many such words in the New Testament. which are used only of certain persons or of a certain time or place, each of which express a very different idea, although they have reference to one and the same thing. Such are μετανοείν, έπιστρέφεσθαι, άνωθεν, γεννηθήναι, άγιασθήναι. มาเอริกังลเ, ล่งลมลเงงบังชิลเ, which, though they are all predicated of amendment of heart and life, yet they exhibit the notion so differently, that they cannot be accounted synonymous. Some indeed, as μετανοείν, άγιασθήναι, express the common notion of amendment; others, as imiorgiρεσθαι, ανωθεν γεννηθήναι, are spoken of a change in the Jews' mode of thinking and acting; the rest, and indeed most words of this class, require the improvement of the manners and life of men already corrupted and defiled by sinful association. And if these words are accounted synonymous, then they are all understood in one sense as of renewing, restoring, and, as it were, forming again human nature, when they ought to be understood of the amendment of the life of men already in existence, and already corrupted; and any one capable of judging, will readily admit the confusion that must thus be introduced. For. although we are not disposed to deny that human nature, even at its best, needs the aid and discipline of the Holy Spirit, that it may obtain a blessed end; nay, we will readily grant that all the posterity of Adam must despair of eternal happiness, unless they steadily pursue that course which the sacred books prescribe, and which is most assuredly pointed out to them by inspiration; yet this also we think evident, that no opinions have been held concerning man's moral state more dreadful, or which ought more justly to be mollified by the favourable use of ambiguous words, than those which apply the Scripture statements, concerning men in a state of actual corruption, to the moral state of human nature itself; and this arises from no other cause than that words, which were affirmed only of certain men in certain places and times, were, as if they involved the same general notion, regarded as synonymous. Certainly this will be granted by all, that a passage concerning man's moral improvement is usually treated as if it spoke indiscriminately of the new-born infant and of the worst man on earth. And we

i It is to be feared that the author has, in these latter remarks, allowed the benevolence of his feelings to carry him away from the line of accurate investigation which he prescribes, and in which he generally walks with much caution. The whole of this passage is far too general and loose in its statements, to warrant an almost sceptical view of the established theology of ages, upon some important points of doctrine. We must not receive even upon so respectable an authority, the mere assertion that, image i profes and ล้านระ ระบบท์กับละ are expressions only to denote a change from Judaism to Christianity; nor would it be a sound canon of criticism, that there is an ambiguity in doctrinal terms in the inspired writers, which should be thrown into the scale in favour of man's present moral condition as a fallen being. It is easy for perverted intellect, or unsound scholarship, to assume this ambiguity, and build on it a false and ruinous dogma; and in fact, this is the fruitful source of most heretical opinions; while, before the meridian light of such acumen as that which Mr. Titmann generally shows, all seeming ambiguity vanishes .--T, might easily multiply such examples if we had room, or if more examples were needed to sustain a self-evident observation. So far however I have spoken, lest the errors into which men fall respecting synonyms, should be accounted of little importance. The ills under which we suffer in this respect are undoubtedly curable; but they lie deeper than is generally thought; nor will they be heard till, in compliance with the advice of Luther, we return to the strict accuracy of grammatic investigation.

Lectainly much of the wild theology, which, to the disgrace of the Christian church in the 19th century, has disturbed the peace of its members, may be traced to the sad inaccuracy with which the word of God is read in the original languages. Women and boys, and sometimes men, (see such publications as the Morning Watch, passim) with a little smattering of Greek and Hebrew, set up for critics and inventors of new views; and so extensive is the want of a habit of strict exceptical interpretation, that not many of the pasters of the present day in our country, are prepared by the ponderous metal of a sound scholarship, to confound and silence their frivolous and baseless speculations. The mists which they raise could not live in the light of such writings as this very able work on the synonyms of Scripture.—T.

CHAPTER II.

It is generally allowed, that one great difficulty in explaining old authors, lies in the accurate observation of the use of words. For. as in the grammatical laws of a language, no such rigid necessity exists, but that an occasional deviation may be permitted; so in the use of cognate words, a still greater latitude of meaning obtains; for those laws arise from fixed causes, and cannot therefore be lost sight of, unless the causes themselves are removed, (although custom introduces many forms of speech which are contrary to the rule and genius of a language;) but the wider use of particular words is not controlled by certain laws, but is frequently so guided by custom, that not only at different periods, but in writers of the same period, the force of a word materially differs. And this justifies the masters of the hermeneutic school, when they affirm that, next to the grammatical and logical knowledge of a language, regard should be had, especially in rendering the older writers, to the usus loquendi, or sense in which particuvords were received, both generally in the uage in which the book is written, and ially in the writings of its author. And his attempt is not without difficulty in mon cases, so is that difficulty consider-increased in the examination of those ers, who have more frequently receded the customary use of words, whether it rom ignorance of their own language, or the novelty and magnitude of their subcompelled them to a more lax application of the terms already in use. The writers the New Testament Scriptures were of this no class of words, however, is the diffir greater than in those called synonyms; is, in those which, although they may be red to one common notion, yet each presome particular mode and specific markof the thing signified. For in regard to words, not only must great care be taken many words should be falsely accounted nymous; but the determining of those that y are synonymous, is rendered extremely rult; partly because in the natural pros of language the specific force of a word equently changed; and partly because the ed writers, freed from the ambition of mere in which, certainly, real probity consists; they also are called dixain, who fulfil the offices of humanity, as well as those who observe strict In the New Testament, therefore, not only is he who acts justly and blamelessly called dixaus, Rom. iii. 10. (so it is affirmed of Christ, Acts iii. 14; vii. 52. 1 Pet. iii. 18.) but he also who is benign and tender, equitable and clement. So Joseph, Matth. i. 19., is said to be dizais, because he was unwilling to expose his wife to public ignominy; and so God himself, because he pardons sinners, Rom. iii. 26. 1 John i. 9. Many think that this signification of dixalos in the New Testament. springs from the Hebrew, in which צדים often denotes the same with Ton." But even among n There can be no good ground for this idea. Among the scores of instances in which TTY is rendered in the LXX. dinaus, we find but one instance in which that version puts dinaus for TDT, viz. in Isaiah lvii. 1. nai anders dinaus digerras. And here there is no propriety in the rendering; it very improperly confounds two different words in the verse, and destroys its beauty. Our English version draws the correct distinction. "The righteous TTY perisheth and no man layeth it to heart, and merciful men TDT are taken away," &c. Certainly several passages occur in which the LXX. renders the noun TDT by dinausown; but even these generally would be better rendered more strictly according to the original notion of mercy in the Hebrew word. Gen. xix. 19. xx. 13. xxi. 23, the Greeks, dixaus not only signifies just, he who observes the right, and constantly does what the law requires, but he also who observes the duties of humanity. For he who preserves the dian, in all things is equitable, and never excessive; he is lenient when called to punish; he is merciful when called to aid the wretched, even to his own inconvenience. For dian requires not only, that we should render to each his due, in which civil right consists, but that we should give liberally to each, as far as we are able, consistently with justice to others; for the difference between justice and equity is altogether exploded from the law of morals. And as the notion of dian originates in the idea that things are equally distributed, he is called dixage who both observes that which is lawful and right, and who does what virtue and equity require. Ruhnken on Xenophon, Memor. iv. 4, 5, says, " Δίπαιος is spoken of a person or thing in whom nothing is excessive, nothing deficient, which is ade-

dc. In the first case, our translators have rendered it mercy, and in the other two, kindness. But, in fact, the term δίκαιος is only applied to men in such instances as the case of Joseph referred to in the text, as indicative of that justice and equity out of which the external act of kindness and mercy, in question, is assumed to flow. He was δίκαιος, and, therefore, he was kind and merciful.—T.

quate to its appointed functions, and perfect in There is another notion akin to its numbers. this, when that is said to be dizaios which preserves uniformity and consistency in all its parts." Hence, in Xenoph. Cyrop. ii. 2. 26, a chariot is said not to be dizares, that is, it would not keep an even course, when drawn by horses of unequal strength or swiftness. Wherefore, dixaios often signifies that which is fit and suitable, as $\gamma \tilde{\eta}$ δίκαία, in Pollux i. 227: and yhdiov diratorarov Cyrop. viii. 3, 38,0 is not the most fertile soil, but the most congenial. The Romans used justice or just in this sense, like the German gerecht, as expressing that which is proper and fit, that in which there is nothing defective or redundant. But the Jews. whose minds were imbued with the notion of civil justice, only when they sought the blessings of divine grace, had in view justice in its strictest sense, but were totally alien from the sublime moral feeling which we admire in that saying of our blessed Lord, which declares God only to be ayasis, good, that is the summum bonum.

In the word δίκαιος therefore, the notion of just, right, equitable, prevails. In the word αγαβος, the notion of benefit and utility.

[°] See Schneider's edition of Cyrop.—T.

born of a good or bad race. For they are called, unworthy, as the parable plainly declares. And it would be both absurd and unjust, promiscuously to invite men of any condition, and then when they were assembled, with severe rebuke to cast out those who were found to be of an inferior condition. In Romans vii. 12. the commandment is said to be both dixaia xai άγαθή the one, because it teaches nothing but what is just; the other, because it regards the happiness of those to whom it was given, v. 13. In the same way they are opposed in Rom. v. 7. Scarcely for a righteous man (δικαίου) would one die, but for a good man (ἀγαθοῦ) some would even dare to die. Though a man be free from crime, it is not necessary that he be freed from the risk of suffering; but for a beneficent man, (Matth. xx. 15.) some would not hesitate to die.

Δίπαιος then, is of more extensive meaning than ἀγαθός for δίπαιος is one who follows the law of right and equity, whether it issues to others in good or ill; but ἀγαθός is he who does good to others; and even those who are πονηροί may sometimes "give good gifts," Matth. vii. 11. But since the law of equity requires, that if it is allowable and possible we should do good to all, and not always use our own right, άχηρατοι γάμων τε άγνοι ζωσιν. In Homer it is the epithet applied to the goddesses, but only in the Odyssey.) Hence αναστροφή αγνή 1 Pet. iii. 2, is a pure life contaminated by no crimes; and 1 Tim. v. 22, we have occurred ayour riges, it being previously enjoined "neither to partake of other men's sins." In 2 Cor. vii. 11, κατεστήσατε έαυτους άγνους είναι έν τῷ πράγματι, is not. as some have rendered it, contrary to the genius of the language, "Ye have proved vourselves to be pure from this crime." (For it is not said, άγνός ἐν τινι, but άγνός τινος and άγνός τι) but, ye have proved in this matter, i. e. by this event, that ye are pure." Therefore, in 1 John iii. 3. God is said to be ἀγνός, as he is free from all evil, and in James iii. 7. the wisdom from above is said to be αγνή, because it is most pure, and because he who is imbued with it has a pure mind; and they are in error who explain the passage as if that wisdom required and imparted purity: άγνός, therefore, especially denotes the absence of all impurity.

But άγιος more particularly regards that which is worthy of veneration and demands our reverence. For although άγιος is often used of sacred things, as ἐορτὰ άγιος, Odyss. φ v. 259; for sacred rites ought especially to be free from impurity; yet άγιος is more directly used the Greeks, dixago, not only signifies just, he who observes the right, and constantly does what the law requires, but he also who observes the duties of humanity. For he who preserves the dian, in all things is equitable, and never excessive; he is lenient when called to punish; he is merciful when called to aid the wretched, even to his own inconvenience. For dian requires not only, that we should render to each his due, in which civil right consists, but that we should give liberally to each, as far as we are able, consistently with justice to others; for the difference between justice and equity is altogether exploded from the law of morals. And as the notion of dian originates in the idea that things are equally distributed, he is called dixasos who both observes that which is lawful and right, and who does what virtue and equity require. Ruhnken on Xenophon, Memor. iv. 4, 5, says, " Δίχαιος is spoken of a person or thing in whom nothing is excessive, nothing deficient, which is ade-

dc. In the first case, our translators have rendered it mercy, and in the other two, kindness. But, in fact, the term dinams is only applied to men in such instances as the case of Joseph referred to in the text, as indicative of that justice and equity out of which the external act of kindness and mercy, in question, is assumed to flow. He was dinams, and, therefore, he was kind and merciful.—T.

selves with, as Luke xi. 41: Matt. xxiii. 19: Rom. xiv. 20: Tit. i. 15: Heb. x. 22. Now the radagór is that in which nothing sordid or base is intermixed, Matt. v. 8; xa Saga ouveidnas, 1 Tim. iii. 9, βρησκεία καθαρά, James i. 27. καθαe65 therefore is spoken of purity of mind, as ayvis, and yet there is a degree of difference. For in xadagós it is implied that there is no foreign admixture or addition that affects the use or the senses, so as to render the person or thing unfit or objectionable, as dirt or stain, odour, colour, or any useless thing whatever. The dying words of Cyrus, in the Cyroped. viii. 7, strikingly illustrate this idea, oudé ye δπως άφρων έσται ή ψυχής έπειδάν τοῦ άφρονος σώματος δίχα γένηται, οὐδὲ τοῦτο πέπεισμαι άλλ' όταν ἄκρατος xal nadaeds o vous enneide, rore nal peoviluararor sinds ลบราชิง ะโงลเ. And as Xenoph. Oecon. x. 7, calls a body, καθαεδν σωμα, not because it is free from defilement, but from every false adornment; so James uses Senoxeía xadaeá for that in which there is no mixture of falsehood. Very nearly allied, however, to this word is autarros, which James, in this passage, uses in conjunction with xadagós, (Compare Heb. xiii. 4.) Yet if they had not been different in sense, they would not have been used together. Certainάγιος άγνός δσιος λερός αμίαντος χαθαρός

All these words so far agree, that they denote purity of mind, blamelessness, and integrity of spirit. They differ, therefore, from dirace, and dyadie, for these have reference more immediately to the reason of acting It is possible for a man to be dirace or dyadie, who cannot be said to be dirace and dyie. But, besides this, these words differ from each other in respect to the way in which that integrity of mind is regarded.

ἄγιος and ἀγνός, though they have the same etymological origin, differ in their use. For in ayros the proper idea is, that the thing or person is pure, either in body or mind; but the word ayos indicates more especially the reverence which is due to such a person or thing. ayros properly denotes cleanliness of body, but subsequently, like many similar expressions or ideas, being transferred to the mind, it sigfies mental purity. That is άγνόν in which there is nothing impure. In the Orestes of Euripides, l. 1621, άγνις γάς είμι χείζας άλλ' οὐ τὰς φρένας. Hippolyt. v. 316, 317, ἀγνὰς μέν, ὧ σαί, χείγας αίματος φέρεις; Χείγες μέν άγναί, φρήν δ ἔχει μύασμά τι. In the first place, it is used for chastity, 2 Cor. xi. 2. Tit. ii. 5. (Plato de Legg. viii. p. 647. Ε. μέχει μεν παιδογονίας ήτθεοι, καί άπηςατοι γάμων τε άγνοι ζωσιν. In Homer it is the epithet applied to the goddesses, but only in the Odyssey.) Hence avasreopy april 1 Pet. iii. 2, is a pure life contaminated by no crimes; and 1 Tim. v. 22, we have oraurdy apply riges, it being previously enjoined " neither to partake of other men's sins." In 2 Cor. vii. 11, κατεστήσατε έαυτους άγνους είναι έν τῷ πράγματι, is not. as some have rendered it, contrary to the genius of the language, "Ye have proved vourselves to be pure from this crime." (For it is not said, àyvos èv rivi, but àyvos rivos and àyvos ri) but, ye have proved in this matter, i. e. by this event, that ye are pure." Therefore, in 1 John iii. 3. God is said to be άγνός, as he is free from all evil, and in James iii. 7. the wisdom from above is said to be αχνή, because it is most pure, and because he who is imbued with it has a pure mind; and they are in error who explain the passage as if that wisdom required and imparted purity: ayvis, therefore, especially denotes the absence of all impurity.

But ἀγιος more particularly regards that which is worthy of veneration and demands our reverence. For although ἀγιός is often used of sacred things, as ἐορτὶ ἀγιτό, Odyss. φ v. 259; for sacred rites ought especially to be free from impurity; yet ἄγιος is more directly used is, in its meaning, more nearly allied to ayios, and isees to ayios; yet there is a difference. For boios is properly, pure from all crime; one who has committed no crime, but religiously observes every sacred duty." Therefore it does not denote integrity generally, but piety more especially, and the religious observance of offices of piety. ocios is pious. Wherefore bus and dixaus are often used together, the one denoting that which is holy, the other that which is right, as in Sophocles où Simis où o osov. and in Josephus, A. I. viii. 9, 1, xal rwn dixaiwr και όσιων εργων in Charit. i. 10. πρός άνθρώπους δίκαια και πρός θεούς δσια. Schol. Euripides, Hec. v. 788. δσίος is, ο περί τὰ θεῖα δίχαιος. So in Tit. i. 8. St. Paul, 1 Tim. ii. 8, rightly exhorts to lift up holy hands, odious, i. e. which have committed no impient; for truly Xenophon says, Agesil. xi. 2, TOUS SEOUS OUDER HETON OCHOIS ELYOIS A άγνοῖς ἱεροῖς ἦδεσθαι. God himself is in the New Testament said to be bone, as that holy being whom it is impious to dishonour. In Apoc. xvi. 5; Acts ii. 27, τὰ δσια means those pious

God, but because it is in its very nature divine; and, therefore, entirely pure, holy, and worthy of reverence.

Phavorinus, Joses & wiel va Siña dinases .- T.

notes that which is sacred and consecrated to the gods. That, however, in the books of the New Testament it should be used for sanctity of morals is not surprising. For it is well known how careful the Jews were to secure cleanliness in all their sacred rites. could not be sacred which was in any way polluted. Hence, even in the word קרש the cognate notions of purity and sanctity exist, as will abundantly appear from an examination of Levit. xi. 43, 44, (compared with 1 Pet. i. 16,) Deut. xxiii. 14; 2 Sam. xi. 4; Exod. xix. 22; 2 Chron. v. 11: Isa. lxvi. 17.9 They are in error, therefore, who affirm that the primitive notion of dyios is, that which is set apart from vulgar and profane use, and consecrated to

One or two seeming instances to the contrary occur in Scripture, in which the word TUTD is used for a harlot, Genesis xxxviii. 21, compared with verse 15, where the more common word TUTD is used for the same person. Here, evidently, the idea of consecration is separated from that of purity. The TUTD were the prostitutes consecrated to the service of heathen and idolatrous temples. See also Deut. xxiii. 17; Hosea iv. 14. The general use of the word TUTD in Scripture, however, unites both the idea of sanctity and purity. And the anomaly in this other application of the word is explained by the common habit of fallen man both to pollute sacred things, and to throw a veil of religious pretence over impurity; in fact to substitute formal consecration for real holiness.—T.

3

liar uses. aying is that which is sacred, and only can be sacred which is not unclean. hence its various uses in the New Tesmay be accurately obtained. sense, which among the Greek writers 3 proper force, viz. that which is sacred, h it is wicked to injure or contemn, ayou oken in the New Testament of things or ons sacred to God. Rom. xi. 16, ή ἀπαρχή Luke ii. 23, άγιον τῷ πυρίφ πληθήσιται, of the hets, Luke i. 70: Acts iii. 21: 2 Pet. i. 21: e priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 5; of the Apostles, . iii. 5, 8; of the Angels, Matth. xxv. 31; ess. iii. 13; of places, Acts vii. 33; espev of Jerusalem, Matth. iv. 5; and of the ole; 1 Cor. iii. 17; still more frequently, as ix. 13, of Christians, (as in Daniel vii. 21. 24. כרשים) Then, it is that which is to be rated or treated with all honour, and prily with respect to God, Apoc. iv. 8. John 11. Luke i. 49. ἀγιά γεαφή, Rom. i. 2. in αγία, which it is impious to violate. e i. 72. 1 Cor. iii. 17. Then the idea of ty being added to this, it frequently des that which is free from error and vice, om actual defilement, 1 Pet. i. 15. 1 John 0. Mark vi. 20. Ephes. i. 4, I Cor. vii. 84. et. iii. 12. And in 2 Pet. ii. 21, the commandment is called ayia, not because it make holy, but because it is holy in itself, and ought to be inviolate. The use is similar in 2 Tim. i. 9, αλησις άγία; for as αλησις involves the notion of inviting to a certain thing, it follows, that with the addition of the adjective, it implies by the adjective, that thing to which invitation is given. And hence xxñoic ayia is not a calling which makes holy, or which contains in itself the energies of piety, still less does it mean the whole Christian doctrine, but it is the actual call to a life of sanctity; for they to whom the xxños comes are invited that they may be αγιω. So Hebrews iii. 1, πλησις iπουράνιος. Nor is it inevident why the word άχιω is, in the New Testament, the almost constant epithet of the Spirit. Not that it is invariably associated with the word Trivua when something divine is signified. For sometimes σνευμα stands alone, as Matth. xii. 31; 1 Cor. ii. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16: 1 Pet. iii. 18: John iii. 34, or the word Seov is added, as Matth. xii. 28; 1 Cor. vii. 40; or row rareos, Matth. x. 20, compared with Luke xii. But where αγιον is added, σνεῦμα always denotes something which has been wrought by divine power, or the cause itself by which the effect is produced. In both classes of passages dyes re recipa is said, not only because it is from bosos is, in its meaning, more nearly allied to ayros, and isees to ayros; yet there is a difference. For boios is properly, pure from all crime; one who has committed no crime, but religiously observes every sacred duty." Therefore it does not denote integrity generally, but piety more especially, and the religious observance of offices of piety. 60105 is pious. Wherefore idos and dixasos are often used together, the one denoting that which is holy, the other that which is right, as in Sophocles of Signic odd boson. and in Josephus, A. I. viii. 9, 1, xal rww dixaiw και όσιων εργων in Charit. i. 10. πεδς άνθεώπους δίκαια και πρός θεούς δσια. Schol. Euripides, Hec. v. 788. δσίος is, ὁ περί τὰ θεῖα δίπαιος. So in Tit. i. 8. St. Paul, 1 Tim. ii. 8, rightly exhorts to lift up holy hands, odious, i. e. which have committed no impie y; for truly Xenophon says, Agesil. xi. 2, rous Seous ouder herry odious leyous h igveis issois horodau. God himself is in the New Testament said to be bone, as that holy being whom it is impious to dishonour. In Apoc. xvi. 5; Acts ii. 27, τὰ δσια means those pious duties which it were virtuous to perform, and wicked to neglect. But the word occurs in a peculiar sense in Acts xiii. 34, δώσω ὑμἴν τὰ οια Δαβίδ τὰ πιστὰ. Many interpreters illustrate it by a reference of it to the Hebrew TOT, which the LXX frequently renders by oans; and they think, therefore, that in this place rà ion Δαβίδ means the mercies promised to David by God, Isa. lv. 3. But they never can properly render som by mercies or bounties. Paul speaks of a certain thing which it was predicted in Ps. xvi. 10, should happen to David, où duser; ron osion sou iden diag Sogan. This thing, in the words of Isaiah, he calls rà les Δαβίδ. But in Isaiah it is a term expressive of the covenant that God was about to make with the Jewish people; this covenant is called losa Daßid, since properly it is made with David. ωμοσα Δαβίδ, έως τοῦ αἰωνος ετοιμάσω τ σπίσμα σου Ps. lxxxix. 3, 4. The όσια Δαβίδ was nothing more than the covenant made with David, who was at that time the head of the Jewish people. The very words of Isaiah which Paul quotes teach this; and I will covenant with you an eternal covenant, rà iona Dass τὰ πιστά. The subsequent statement shews what covenant is intended. The source is the same as δεχια πιστά in Homer.

God, but because it is in its very nature divine; and, therefore, entirely pure, holy, and worthy of reverence.

Phavorinus, Tous : & wiel va Diña dizaus. T.

'Isgés strictly denotes that which is conseerated or sacred, as given or devoted to God. Whence dissources is to consecrate, and account they who are consecrated; and is frequently spoken of animals who are devoted to God and wander in a free pasture. (Synes. ii. ep. 57, ώσπες έν λερώ περιβόλω τω κόσμω ζωον άφετον, άνειμένον رَّهُمْ) Therefore in the word العَوْنَ, which is accurately rendered sacred, nothing is intended but that the person or thing is sacred to God, irrespective of mind or morals; but especially that it subserves a sacred purpose, as the temple in the New Testament, as the sacred things themselves, in 1 Cor. ix. 13, and repeatedly in Homer and other writers. It is not used in the New Testament of moral habits. Those who, in this sense, are said to be sacred to God, are called dyw. See Valesius ad Harpocrat. p. 143. Valckenar. ad Ammon. p. 184, s. et vv. dd. ad Hesychius v. ocious. lor. ad Aeschin. p. 50.

Kadagos is used to express a mind or a life free from vice; and sometimes those things which they who use them do not defile themselves with, as Luke xi. 41; Matt. xxiii. 19; Rom. xiv. 20: Tit. i. 15: Heb. x. 22. the na Sagór is that in which nothing sordid or base is intermixed, Matt. v. 8; xa Saed our idnow, 1 Tim. iii. 9, βεησκεία καθακά, James i. 27. καθαe65 therefore is spoken of purity of mind, 28 ayros, and yet there is a degree of difference. For in xaSagós it is implied that there is no foreign admixture or addition that affects the use or the senses, so as to render the person or thing unfit or objectionable, as dirt or stain, odour, colour, or any useless thing whatever. The dying words of Cyrus, in the Cyroped viii. 7, strikingly illustrate this idea, ovde 7 όπως άφεων έσται ή ψυχή, έπειδάν τοῦ άφεονος σώματος δίχα γένηται, οὐδὲ τοῦτο πέπεισμαι άλλ' όταν ἄκρατκ και καθαρός ὁ νοῦς ἐκκριθή, τότε και φρονιμώτατον είπλ auròv sívas. And as Xenoph. Oecon. x. 7, calls a body, xa Sagdr owna, not because it is free from defilement, but from every false adornment; so James uses Senoncia na Sagá for that in which there is no mixture of falsehood. Very nearly allied, however, to this word is autarros, which James, in this passage, uses in conjunction with xaSagis, (Compare Heb. xiii. 4.) Yet if they had not been different in sense, they would not have been used together. Certaino be καθαρός a man must be ἀμίαντος. For ess he is immaculate he cannot be pure. In 1970ς then we find the cause of the καθαρός. 1966 then has a more extensive signification 1 ἀγνός. For to it the thought of impurity eccessary. It is freedom from impurity; any thing may be said to be καθαρός in ch there is no foreign admixture, whether e itself good or evil. ἀγνός is that which is contaminated by any thing in itself really. But wine, though it be combined with purest water, can no longer be said to be 196ς. That which is ἀγνός is necessarily κασς but many things that are καθαροί are far agh from being ἀγνοί.

Suidas, ἐιζόν ἄγιον, τῷ Ṣιῷ ἀνατιθιιμένον, and the Editor of Suidas refers this definition to the Schol. on Aristophanes.—Τ.

'hese four words then, if we use them in rence to the human soul and life, may be riminated thus. Καθαζός is pure from every g which would change or corrupt the naof the subject with which it is combined; is pure from every defilement of mind, is pure from crime or impious deed; ἄγιος at which, on account of integrity of mind morals, is sacred to God and revered; and lly, iερός is simply that which is consecrated r set apart for God; καθαζός is pure, immate; ἀγνός is chaste, clean, sinless; δοιος is logous terms, that the same word may not occur in the same period, or even in the same page; although the example of the best writers shews that true elegance consists in the precision with which each word is applied to express its particular idea. For they who write accurately, do not use even the smallest particles indiscriminately, however trivial the ·difference between any two may appear; nor do they hesitate to use the same word often in the same passage, if the same notion is to be conveyed; for there are scarcely two words in any language, which signify precisely the same thing. But since many maintain the opinion, that the New Testament writers are not so elegant as some, and consider that they have used many similar words promiscuously, we grant to them this far, that the specific force of synonyms must not be pressed in every place, so that we should always expect to trace an emphatic sense; or that we should curiously search out the difference of each word as conveying a special force to the passage; for this is beyond the powers of the most able and polished writer; yet at the same time we think that in the writings of men, who do not appear so particular as others in the choice of words, the investigation of synonymous terms is more decidedly required. For those who labour their style of writing closely, are wont to select words more for the sake of ornament, and therefore frequently indulge an interchange of synonyms; whilst they who are unpractised in writing as an art, generally use words which common custom has affixed to the thing that they mean; and hence it occurs, that men who make use of common language, accumulate in their compositions, a greater number of synonyms than more learned men; for they are accustomed to view each thing in its peculiarities, rather than to generalize and to abstract. And this custom must be diligently noted in interpreting the sacred writers; as it is too evident that, through neglect of it, commentators have rashly and carelessly adduced from their accurate and specific sentences, only some jejune and common place thought. For it often happens, that although the sacred writers were strangers to that elegance of style which is formed artificially by study and practice, yet their true meaning cannot be ascertained, unless we accurately make out the precise and specific signification of every word used. This is especially true with respect to the particles, the force of which has been sadly neglected by the Lexicographers of the New Testament. For instance, we read in the Lexicons that, do not differ, and they adduce the authority of Eustathius, who says, p. 1062, yinras rd axpic and τοῦ μέγρις ἀποβολή τοῦ μ και τροπή τοῦ φωνήεντος. Ευεtathius, however, means nothing more than that ἄχρις is formed from μέχρις; not that they mean the same thing. For who would affirm that it would have been the same thing, if, in Rom. v. 13, 14, the Apostle had written μέχρι γας νόμου αμαςτία ήν έν πόσμφ and ver. 14, από 'Αδαμ άχει It must be generally evident that a different idea would then be expressed from that of the Apostle, who wrote axes vomou. i. e. before the law was brought in, and μέχει Μωσέως. i. e. until Moses had brought in the law. Rightly therefore is it written -ἄχει γὰς νόμου αμαρτία ην, for the αμαρτία existed before the law. But in ver. 14, it is said έβασίλευσεν ο θάνατος μέχει Μωσέως, not because death had ceased to reign from the time of Moses, but because it continued through the whole of that period, (μη οντος νόμου) which period closed with Moses. For neither did he wish to say that death reigned both before Moses and after Moses; but that it reigned before Moses, un ovros vóuou. Evidently then the word axe involves more especially the idea of the whole time or place in which any thing is done; and the use of the genitive case denotes the thing or event beexpression. The same \(\lambda_{\text{x}}\)oc of Menelaus is, in one place, said to be preserved axiganos, and in the other, axhearos. It does not, however, follow from this, that axigaios and axigaros have the same meaning. It is one thing for two. words to be predicated mutually of the same thing, since what the one accords with, the other may accord with also; and it is another thing for them to have precisely the same signification. In the neglect of this difference, the lexicographers of the New Testament have very frequently erred. But to return. 'Axéeases, therefore, when it is spoken of mind, signifies, simple, entirely free from false or evil admixture. Euripid. Orest. v. 912. Zuverde de χωρείν όμόσε τοῖς λόγοις θέλων, Απέραιος, ἀνεπίληπτον ήσχηχώς βίου, evidently in the same sense as Matth. x. 16. φεόνιμοι ώς αὶ ὄφεις, καὶ ἀκὲραιοι ώς αὶ περιστεραί; and Romans xvi 19. σοφούς μέν είς τὸ άγαθον, ἀκεραίους δε είς το κακόν, i. e. wise towards that which is good, and free from all evil. Phil. ii. 15. άμεμπτοι και ἀκέραιοι.

äχει and μέχει

Finally, ἄκακος is he who is both free altogether from the influence of evil counsel κακλα, and who fears no evil from others, as it is commonly said, simple and ingenuous, both these ideas exist in the word ἄκακος; one who neither purposes evil nor suspects it, since he is altogether alien to it. See Ruhnken. ad Tim. v. ἄκακος. It does not denote every species of simplicity, but that ingenuous simplicity which exists in an upright mind, free from suspicions. So in Romans xvi. 18, ἐξακανῶσι τὰς καρδίας τῶν ἀκάκων. Such men are easily deceived. Plato Alcibiad. ii. p. 81. ο μὲν μεγαλοψύχους [καλοῦσιν] οἱ δὲ εὐηθεις. ἔτεροι δὲ ἀκάκους καὶ ἀπείρους καὶ ἐνέους. γ Sometimes, however, it is used in the former sense, to denote a man free from all evil, Heb. vii. 26.

'Απλοῦς therefore is free from all duplicity, ἀπέςαιος, unmixed with evil, ἄπαπος, free from all evil suspicion, ἀπλοῦς is open, sincere, ἀπέςαιος blameless, ἄπαπος ingenuous; and all of them imply simplicity.

άμεμπτος. άμωμος. (άνεπίληπτος. άνέγκλητος.)

ἄμεμπτος and ἄμωμος are both expressions for freedom from blame; they however differ. He is ἄμεμπτος, in whom nothing is yet accounted wanting; ἄμωμος, he in whom there is nothing reprehensible. Each is free from reprehension: the former, as perfect and absolute in all his numerical parts; the latter as devoid of error. Hence a law which is ἄμεμπτος Heb. viii. 7, is a law which cannot be found fault with, because there is nothing wanting to it, which ought to be there; it answers all the purposes of a law. Whilst, on the other hand, Peter, in Epist. 1. i. 19. speaks of Christ as of a lamb, άμώμου και άσπίλου, inasmuch as he was without any spot of defilement. We have also in this sense, ἀμώμους καλ ἀνεγκλήτους in Coloss. i. 22. Nor, does the sense of the word differ in that very difficult passage in Hebrews ix. 14, δς διά πνεύματος αἰωνίου ἐαυτὸν προσήνεγχεν ἄμωμον τῷ θεῷ, where ammunos does not relate to a perfect expiation in which there is nothing wanting; but this is the idea of the Apostle; that we are to be purged from all impurity by the blood of Christ, who by the eternal spirit (i. e. by the δύναμεν ζωῆς ἀχασαλύτου, Heb. vii. 16.) offered himself a victim, uncontaminated and immaculate (omni macula carentem) and in Ephes.

⁵ See Plato Dial. ex recensione Bekkeri, Part I. vol. iip. 276.—T.

That is, not that by the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit, operating as in the case of fallen and corrupt men, he succeeded to present, i. e. to make himself, without spot, notwithstanding his tendencies to sin; an error which has lately crept in among us; but that he being a divine person, and therefore immaculate and uncontaminate, did by the Holy Spirit offer himself a victim, and, on account of that immaculacy, a fitting victim. This is a beautiful instance, in which accurate exegesis throws a very valuable light on a question, at once of much interest and much difficulty. Had the Christ been in his human nature corrupt and sinful, he could not be happens; for that corrupt nature in us, is itself

v. 27. the church is therefore said to be made αγία καὶ ἄμωμος, ἡ μὴ ἔχουσα σπίλον ἥ ἐντίδα, ἥ τι τῶν τωούτων. For μῶμος properly is a shame, stain, or disgrace, visibly attached to any thing.

But the idea of the word authoriog sets forth one who cannot be blamed, because nothing is wanting to him, for which, if wanting, he would deservedly incur blame. Hence in 1 Thess. v. 23. Paul desires to be preserved αμεμπτως until the coming of the Lord, and in c. ii. 10. he says, δσίως καλ δικαίως καλ άμεμπτως υμίν έγεννήθημεν; showing in the subsequent verse, that he had not failed in his duty towards one of them. He had acted ἀμέμπτως because he had done no less than it was right that he should do. So αμέμπτως δωρα διδόναι, Xenoph. H. G. I, i. 10. αμέμπτως δέχεσθαι τοὺς άνδρας Cyrop. iv. 2. 18. άμεμπτον δείπνον Sympos. 2, 2. Although, ἄμεμπτος is sometimes used in both senses, especially by the Attic writers, who, even in administering reproof, are more polished in their style than others. They seldom make use of the other word, because it would appear a higher style of praise to the mapes, or stain which renders us unacceptable in ourselves; but in that holy thing which was conceived by the overshadowing of the Holy Ghost, we are with Excuse switch,

&c. He is, as a divine person from first to last, Zuopes;

and we are so in him. T.

use a word, which not only implies that no spot or stain exists, but that nothing is wanting which could properly be desired.

ἀνέγκλητος and ἀνεπίληπτος are cognate words. He is ἀνέγκλητος who is not accused, and cannot properly be accused by any one. But in 1 Tim. iii. 2. the Apostle, says the Christian Pastor should be ἀνεπίληπτος, i. e. one in whom no just cause of blame exists. Whilst in v. 10. the word ἀνέγκλητος is used to infer, that in δοκιμασία, i. e. as the result of public investigation, in der öffentlichen umfrage, he stands unaccused. For it was the custom even in apostolic times, to constitute the minister by the consent of the church, that is of the people. The people therefore were interrogated,

* It is surprising how far men's peculiar preconceived notions will carry them. The author sees a popular appointment of a candidate to be a minister, in the mere popular investigation into character, even if the desirpasis can be explained in that way. He loses sight of the fact, that the whole of the passage is an injunction to an individual, to Timothy, the prelate, v. 15. how he is to conduct himself in the church of God, so that, c. v. 22. he may not lay hands rashly on any man, and become a partaker in other men's sins. The rule here laid down for the desirpasis, even stretched to the uttermost, will be found very much in accordance with the church of England custom, of reading a paper in the congregation where the candidate customarily worshipped, called a si quis, intimating si quis, &c. If any

as to whether any subject of reprehension was found in the candidate, and if he was found ανέγκλητος he was ordained. This is the true observation of Grotius de imperio summar. potest. circa sacra c. 10. § 8. anailymros, i. e. who gives no cause for reprehension, un wagiyar πατηγοείας ἀφοεμήν. (Schol. Thueyd. v. 17.) So 1 Tim. iii. 2. and in vi. 14. aoridor nail averidneror; ἀνεπίληπτος because ἄσπιλος. The word, however, differs from the others. For as augusto and august μω denote those who are not blamed, ἀνεπίληπτος denotes one, who though he is blamed is undeserving of it. In Lucian. Pisc. 8. Tom. 1 p. 377. a man blamed and accused, when called on to defend himself says, εἰ μέν τι ἀδιχῶν φαίνωμαι---ην δε παθαρός ύμιν και άνεπίληπτος ευρίσκωμαι. At times, however, this word is used in a more lax sense, regard being had only to the fact of blame, and not to the real force of the cause of it: for the ἄμιμπτω and ἄμωμω, are but few. but the ἀνιπίληπτοι are few indeed.

one knows any thing against him that he is to declare it. But all notion of authority on the part of the people, as founded on this passage of Scripture, in the matter is a mere invention. The scrutiny of character might be a popular matter, and the choice of ministers already ordained to be pastors of particular churches might be so too, and probably was; but the ordination, as a matter of right, in the primitive church was entirely vested in the clerical order.—T.

CHAPTER III.

In a former notice of some obvious synonyms in the New Testament, it was observed that the distinction between synonymous terms, must not be so pressed in every instance, as that we shall be chiefly playing on the force of particular terms; yet that, in seeking an accurate interpretation, we should observe diligently the minute differences of words, lest in any passage in which the author aimed at a nice distinction of idea, it should be lost sight of through inaccuracy. This remark, however, in the hands of one little familiarized with the nicer beauties of style, may be easily so far perverted as to induce him to affirm, that all inquiry into the differences between synonyms is utterly useless. For, if even the sacred writers often use synonymous terms promiscuously, and that it evidently matters little whether they used the one word or the other, it were scarcely worth while to attempt to discriminate accurately between them. there are certainly many writers, who consider elegance of style to consist in the not frequently using the same word, but rather in substituting another, in an interchange of anaexpresses an existence in all time past, and which yet has not an end; but αίωνος only that of which no end is conceived. Therefore, ἀἰδιος κοιτεῦ δύναμις καὶ θειότης; and sometimes that which, although it had a beginning, yet is not considered to have an end, as Jud. v. 6, δεσμοῖς ἀιδιοις; and Diodorus Sicul. i. 51, τάρους αίδιους οἴκους σχοσαγορεύουση.

On the contrary, ἀιώνιος, although it may appear to be capable of denoting all duration throughout all ages; yet strictly in the New Testament, it is used of duration through all future time. So continually it occurs in conjunction with ζωή, δοξα, κείσις, τιμή κόλασις λύτςωσις κληςονομία βασιλεία κείμα πῦς: (2 Cor. iv. 18, τὰ αἰώνια opposed to πρόσκαιςα.) Whence it is quite needless to argue about this word, and to show more fully that it is not always used absolutely of eternity. But there are passages in which αἰώνιος is applied to that which endures for a long period; as Rom.

brought forth," &c. ארה ארה אלה (כעולם ער־עולם ארה אלה) "from everlasting to everlasting thou art God." It is somewhat remarkable that the Latin adverb, olim, which is the same word, אנולם, has retained both senses from its etymon, and not only refers to past time but to future. "Et hace olim meminisse juvabit." Virgil.—T.

There is this tendency to excess in the human mind in labour their style of writing closely, are wont to select words more for the sake of ornament, and therefore frequently indulge an interchange of synonyms; whilst they who are unpractised in writing as an art, generally use words which common custom has affixed to the thing that they mean; and hence it occurs, that men who make use of common language, accumulate in their compositions, a greater number of synonyms than more learned men; for they are accustomed to view each thing in · its peculiarities, rather than to generalize and to abstract. And this custom must be diligently noted in interpreting the sacred writers; as it is too evident that, through neglect of it, commentators have rashly and carelessly adduced from their accurate and specific sentences, only some jejune aud common place thought. For it often happens, that although the sacred writers were strangers to that elegance of style which is formed artificially by study and practice, yet their true meaning cannot be ascertained, unless we accurately make out the precise and specific signification of every word used. This is especially true with respect to the particles, the force of which has been sadly neglected by the Lexicographers of the New Testament. For instance, we read in the Lexicons that.

axe and mixe

do not differ, and they adduce the authority of Eustathius, who says, p. 1062, γίνεται τὸ ἄχρις ἀπὸ τοῦ μέχρις ἀποβολή τοῦ μ και τροπή τοῦ φωνήεντος. Ευεtathius, however, means nothing more than that äχρις is formed from μέχρις; not that they mean the same thing. For who would affirm that it would have been the same thing, if, in Rom. v. 13, 14, the Apostle had written μέχρι γας νόμου αμαρτία ήν έν πόσμφ and ver. 14, ἀπὸ 'Αδαμ ἄχρι It must be generally evident that a different idea would then be expressed from that of the Apostle, who wrote αχει νόμου i. e. before the law was brought in, and μέχχι Μωσέως i. e. until Moses had brought in the law. Rightly therefore is it written - ἄχει γὰς νόμου αμαστία ήν, for the αμαστία existed before the law. But in ver. 14, it is said ἐβασίλευσεν ὁ θάνατος μέχει Μωσέως, not because death had ceased to reign from the time of Moses, but because it continued through the whole of that period, (μη οντος νόμου) which period closed with Moses. For neither did he wish to say that death reigned both before Moses and after Moses; but that it reigned before Moses, μη ὄντος νόμου. Evidently then the word axe involves more especially the idea of the whole time or place in which any thing is done; and the use of the genitive case denotes the thing or event beobservation of the usage with respect to them; for the reason of that difference is but seldom to be sought with success in their etymology, especially among the New Testament writers. These words, therefore, so far agree, as that they have each in them a common notion of a time in which something is conceived to be, or to have been, done. Yet they differ; for χ_2^{coro} , and aiw have the notion of indefinite time; we denotes a certain and definite space of time, (as it were δ_2^{co} , terminus. xaigo; is the time, that is, the opportune point of time, the very time at which a thing should be done. But even χ_2^{coro} , and aiw differ; for aiw signifies an f I do not wish to attach too great importance to etymology, for I am fully conscious, both of its difficulties, and of the dangers it presents to the student; I admit, also, the force of the author's remark in the text. At the same time, I am satisfied that there are many words, the sense of which may be made out most accurately by reference to the etymon; and that there are synonyms, the distinctions between which are preserved in the respective etymons. Take, for instance, Luke iii. 5. καὶ πὰν δρος καὶ βρυνὸς ταπεινωθήσεται. The distinction between the hill and the mountain is marked in the Hebrew etymon, igos being from 77 mons, montana loca, and βουνὸς from בנע, dropping אָ, בע, collis, a hill, or bank, which is the same word retained in English through the Anglo-Saxon, banc. And thus it stands in the Hebrew, which the LXX has rendered almost literally, ובלדה וובעה. Isaiah xl. 4.- T.

indefinite course or flow of time, so that, if it is used simply, it is without the notion of an end or close; but xeóvos denotes the time itself in its actuality, by which we perceive the succession of things. Therefore, it is said correctly, xebra αἰώνιοι; but no one ever said, αἰών χεόνιος. In the New Testament this holds good also. For wiw always denotes the perpetuity of successional time, unless a definition of that time is added. Whence the formula eig row aiwa; and in Matth. xii. 32, it appears to be said of the whole period of a man's life on the earth; but not so in Matth. xxviii. 20, Foomas med' iman was τῆς συντέλείας τοῦ αἰῶνος: for here, as in 1 Cor. x. 11, συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, is spoken of that change in the character of time, or of the age, up to which period the Lord had promised to be with his disciples. But in Ephes. ii. 7.

B Συντίλια τοὺ αἰῶνος, as it occurs in the New Testament, does not denote the end, but rather the consummation of the αἰῶν, which is to be followed by a new age. So in Matth. xiii. 39, 40, 49, and xxiv. 3; which last passage, it is to be feared, may he misunderstood in applying it to the destruction of the world. The same idea exists in this formula in Hebrews ix. 26, which has its parallel in Ephcs. i. 10, πλή-ξωμα τῶν καιρῶν.

[[] It were scarcely warranted to found any thing on the use of a term so vague by the Redeemer's yet ill-informed disciples. It must be remembered, that they were not teaching, in this instance, by inspiration, but asking in ig-aičms; ἐπιςχόμενω, are ages to come. The Apostle, however, uses it, in this instance, to denote those, his own express and present times, in which was at length manifested, ver. 8, "the exceeding riches of grace." And ἐπιςχόμενοι is not necessarily to be understood of time which is not yet present, but simply denotes a time which has followed another; as James v. 1, παλακτωρίαι ἐπιςχόμεναι, are calamities which are already present or thought to be so.

So also the word $\chi góws_c$ is never used to express a certain and definite time; but when it occurs apparently in that sense, the force of the idea will not be found in the word $\chi góws_c$, but in the adjuncts. For, in two passages in Luke viii. 29, and xx. 9, where $\chi góws_c$ appears to signify years, there is another reason for it; for $\chi góws_c$, as a sort of aggregate of times, by the usage of recent writers, has been put for the space of a year, as the most known and familiar aggregate of times; in the same way as $\omega g \omega$ is used loosely and popularly for the parts of a day. Yet χεόνος by itself is not a specific limited time. And, in fact, it may well be doubted whether χεόνοι ἰπανοί should be rendered, many years. It is a frequent error in lexicons, that if a Greek word can be rendered so as to make sense by any particular Latin word, they affirm that the two words have the same meaning; and hence the greatest monstrosities have sprung up in the lexicons, especially in respect to the prepositions. For who could ever be persuaded that ἐκ signifies ad, in, and cum, or that εἰς could be de; ἀπὸ, ad and in, and κατά, ex, &c.?

norance. Many such instances occur in the evangelic history. Luke ix. 33. John xiv. 5, 22. On such passages no doctrine can be founded, any more than on the fallacious averments of Job's friends; nor any criticism on the use of terms by the disciples, in a popular and inaccurate sense, except as to the usus loquendi.]—T.

Καιρός always denotes a certain specific time, with the superadded notion of opportunity. (Ammonius says very accurately ὁ μὲν χαιρὸς δηλοῦ ποιότητα χρόνου, χρόνος δὲ ποσύτητα.) For that which is done opportunely, is understood to be done at a certain period of time; while that which is done rashly, and not at a fixed time, is almost necessarily done inopportunely. Whence it occurs, that sometimes the word may be used indefinitely; and yet it may be gathered from the whole tenor of the address, what that is of which the χαιρός is affirmed. So in Matth. xxvi. 18, ὁ χαιρός μου ἐγγύς ἐστιν, the τοῦ ἀποθανελ

h See Du Cange Glossar. Med. et Inf. lat. and Hemsterhusius ad Aristoph. Phil. 1084.

e had called together his kinsfolk and acintance. And, although I would not stand too strictly, if it should be said, that here, 1 Xenophon, μέχρι is put for ἄχρι, yet this ch I have stated seems to be the very force he language. For, if Cornelius had intendo say that he had fasted for four successive 3 to the very hour when he met Peter, he ild have said, not hun, but simi morelow. re may call these needless subtleties, and k that no good comes of such nice discrimions; but really, it is often in such minute ervations as these that the religious revee of the interpreter for the sacred writings ears; for he who once conceives, that in laining the sacred books he may acquiesce ny lax inaccurate explanation, will speedily aside all veneration for them, and learn speedily to engraft his own views, and n the most dark and ill-founded notions n the writings of the New Testament.c

This is an invaluable remark, and founded upon a very rate, minute criticism, which directly illustrates its. No man who has been much among the theologous called, of the present day, will fail to perceive the rtance of this observation, if his own mind has been in measure trained to correct exegesis. The wild and ininably varied and varying notions of men on Scriptruth, if they have not their source in this habit of and inaccurate construing, at least, find in it their pa-

But to return. It is written in Luke iv. 13. άπίστη άπ' αὐτοῦ ὁ διάβολος ἄχρι καιροῦ. It was seen that this could not be rendered, for a certain time. Therefore, the lexicographers say, that axe denotes the same as the Latin usque, and they render axer xareou, ab hoc ipso tempore. But they never can demonstrate axes sauge of the to be ab hoc tempore, nor that usque is used in that sense. For it is not said axes ansorn and αὐτοῦ, but ἄχρι καιροῦ. But μέχρι καιροῦ differs from axe xaseo. In Heb. ix. 10, it is said, μέγρι καιρού διορθώσεως έπικείμενα, i. e. είς τον καιρον τον ένεστηχότα, v. 9. Therefore, μέχρι χαιροῦ denotes up to a certain time, scil. for sometime, as often μέχρι χαιρων, μέχρι τινός, (whence μέχρι παντός, always, Charit. v. 4. Aristaenet. ii. 14.) s. iac ααιροῦ (τινός) Sirac. i. 23, 24; Dan. vii. 12. ίως γρόνου και καιρού. But άχρι καιρού is έως τέλους, s. μέχρι τέλους. Clearly then ἄχρι, as we have before said, denotes not the end, but the duration, or the whole period of time, in which the thing in question continues; but uéxes desigbulum vitae. Doctrinal notions are formed anterior to critical investigation, and then are vindicated and confirmed by the most extravagant and unjustifiable forcing of the words of eternal truth. And wherever this habit of mind has become established, the most polished and pointed shafts of enlightened criticism fall ineffectively from it, as arrows from the thick hide of the rhinoceros.—T is not, in fact, omitted, (for it is written i καιρός μου, and not merely, i καιρός,) but from the very time in which he gave this injunction to his disciples, it might have been known what was i xaigis airou. But when xaigis is combined with another word, then it does not denote the opportunity of the thing; but the whole formula does it, as παιεός σύπων, Mark xi. 13. καιεός τῶν καςτῶν, Matth. xxi. 34, where the lexicons very incorrectly render xagós, the time of vear. For xaigis denotes any opportunity whatsoever, not only of time, but of place, and of the apt and convenient means for doing any thing; as the notion of opportunity involves in it the notion of time. For, if the place is convenient for a certain act, then καιρός εὖκαιρός ἐσκ, that it should be done there. If the thing itself is fit and convenient, it may then be made use of. Wherefore, we must not at once condemn the views of some, regarding Mark xi. 13, οὐ γὰς ἦν καιρὸς σύκων, that it refers to the opportunity of place; (Abresch. Lect. Aristaenet. vol. i. p. 16, 17, Triller. ad Thom. Mag. p. 490.) if, indeed, it be necessary to vindicate our Lord's act at all. Nor, indeed, would the excuse be sufficient, that the place was not suitable to that kind of fruit; if we could, for a moment, imagine that our Lord, disappointed in his expectation, had acted in anger, a passion from which the divine mind But, in fact, xargoi is often said of any opportunity (as the Latins use tempora,) in which any thing can be conveniently done. I will also make one passing remark on the formula which occurs twice in the New Testament, Ephes. v. 16, and Coloss. iv. 5, igayogaζόμενοι τὸν καιρόν. In both places the Apostle exhorts Christians to live prudently and cautiously; and, therefore, commands them ¿ξαγορά-Coodan row xangov. Luther renders this, schicket euch in die Zeit.k This gives the idea certainly. my view, however, έξαγοράζεσθαι τον παιρόν, is, according to the manner of merchants who accurately examine goods, and choose the best, diligently to watch the time, and to make it our own, that we may over-rule or control it; as Pindar well says of Damophilus, Pyth. iv. v. 509, ἐὖ νιν (τὸν καιρόν) ἔγνωκεν θεράπων δέ οἰ, οὐ δεάστας, δπαδεί. You are not to yield to time, and to serve it, but you may command it, and it shall do what you approve. And evidently this idea agrees best with the relation of both the passages.1

^{*} So also Rom. xii. 11, he renders the words τῷ καιρῷ δουλιύοντις, which reading, by the by, though admitted by Griesbach, has always appeared to me doubtful.

¹ The same formula occurs in the LXX. Dan ii. 8. Lu-

But, since opportunity is generally fleeting, and of very short duration, as Pindar says, ό γὰς παιρός πρός ἀνθρώπων βραχύ μέτρον έχει, therefore, meds xaugóv means, at a time, considered as no longer enduring than while the opportunity contemplated lasts; as Luke viii. 13, of meds xaugh riorsioness, are they who believed for a time, while it was convenient, and no danger threatened: but εν καιρώ πειρασμού άφίστανται. And now we may explain that singular formula, which occurs in Apoc. xii. 14, xaigdr xai xaigoù; xai nuiou xaugov. It is usually rendered, three years and a half; and rightly; for the same space of time is, in ver. 6, and c. xi. 3, spoken of, as ημέρας χιλίας διακοσίας εξήκοντα; and in xi. 2, μηνας πεσαράχοντα δύο. But that this number is used for any space of time, according to the Hebrew mode, is evident. (see Eichhorn on Apoc. xi. (2) And, therefore, xaight, in this place, is not

ther renders it. "Ich sehe, dass ihr Frist suchet." But the idea is the same here also. "I know that you accurately watch the time." They knew that the king had forgotten his dream, and therefore, they asked him to tell it, not so much for the purpose of delay, as with a view to avoid the necessity of giving the interpretation. [The idea is, in my opinion, more directly expressed in the Chaldee, and well rendered in our English version. "I know that ye would gain the time." אנתן זבנץ "בור" ערנא אנתן זבנץ" ביי פורי ערנא אנתן זבנץ "ד".

mula can be referred to this idea,) but how, before the past ages, can be the same as, from the most ancient times, this they do not show, neither can they. The matter is very plain, aiώνιος is that which endures through the aiών; χχόνοι αiώνιο, therefore, are those successive periods which fill up or constitute the aiών or created time, and προ χχόνων αiώνιων is before those remote times, before the longest time of which memory remains, heretofore, long ago. But this leads us to consider the terms;

αιών χείνος. ωξα. καιείς.

And we doubt not, but that the remark will be made by some one, that these words so far differ, that they cannot be accounted synonymous; for, that ω̃ρα does not denote time generally, but only a definite part of the day, and that xaighs, properly means, opportunity. Yet it is generally known that there are, in all languages, many words, to which usage and custom have affixed a force which was peculiar to other words, and have thus converted into synonyms, words which originally had a separate and specific signification. And in words of this kind, which are thus accounted synonymous, this is the greatest difficulty, that the ascertaining the distinction between them as synonyms, depends mainly upon the accurate means the least portion of time. For in such passages as Matth. viii. 13; ix. 22; x. 19. Luke xii. 39, 46, no one would think that ω̃ρα was a moment or mere point of time, when it is evident that he who affirms an event to occur, i th were excire, means a more definite time than if he had said ἐν τῷ χρόνφ ἐπείνφ. And though reds ω̃ear, may be rendered, a good while, in the same way as agos, xaigo, yet it were still incorrect to say that we means any minute portion of time. Certainly when a small part of time is intended, the word wea might be used, for it denotes a small part of the day; and therefore, we's wear is the same as aliquod tempus, at some time: but it does not follow from this, that ώςα is, a little time, generally. There is a difference, however, between πεδς ωξαν and πεδς raigh. For that which is said to endure, mede igar, is conceived not to last longer than till the hour is expired, i. e. for only a short time; but that which is said to be done, mede ranger, is conceived as being done precisely up to another point of time.

Another formula also differs from περὸς καιςών, viz. περὸς τόν καιςών. It means, conveniently, as time shall permit. Lucian. i. Deor. Dial. iv. 209. The force of the article may be noticed in the formula, κατὰ καιςών Rom. v. 6. See Lucian, i.

indefinite course or flow of time, so that, if it is used simply, it is without the notion of an end or close; but 250005 denotes the time itself in its actuality, by which we perceive the succession of things. Therefore, it is said correctly, xgónu αίωνω; but no one ever said, αίων χρόνιος. In the New Testament this holds good also. For win always denotes the perpetuity of successional time, unless a definition of that time is added. Whence the formula is row aiwa: and in Matth. xii. 32, it appears to be said of the whole period of a man's life on the earth; but not so in Matth. xxviii. 20, εσομαι μεβ' ὑμῶν εως της συντέλείας τοῦ αἰῶνος; for here, as in l Cor. x. 11, συντέλεια τοῦ αίῶνος, is spoken of that change in the character of time, or of the age, up to which period the Lord had promised to be with his disciples.8 But in Ephes. ii. 7,

⁵ Συντίλια τοὺ αἰῶνος, as it occurs in the New Testament, does not denote the end, but rather the consummation of the αἰῶν, which is to be followed by a new age. So in Matth. xiii. 39, 40, 49, and xxiv. 3; which last passage, it is to be feared, may he misunderstood in applying it to the destruction of the world. The same idea exists in this formula in Hebrews ix. 26, which has its parallel in Ephes. i. 10, πλή-εμμα τῶν καιρῶν.

[[] It were scarcely warranted to found any thing on the use of a term so vague by the Redeemer's yet ill-informed disciples. It must be remembered, that they were not teaching, in this instance, by inspiration, but asking in ig-αίῶτες ἐπεςχόμενω, are ages to come. The Apostle, however, uses it, in this instance, to denote those, his own express and present times, in which was at length manifested, ver. 8, "the exceeding riches of grace." And ἐπεςχόμενοι is not necessarily to be understood of time which is not yet present, but simply denotes a time which has followed another; as James v. 1, ταλαιπωρίαι ἐπεςχόμεναι, are calamities which are already present or thought to be so.

So also the word χ_26006 is never used to express a certain and definite time; but when it occurs apparently in that sense, the force of the idea will not be found in the word χ_26006 , but in the adjuncts. For, in two passages in Luke viii. 29, and xx. 9, where χ_26000 appears to signify years, there is another reason for it; for χ_26006 , as a sort of aggregate of times, by the usage of recent writers, has been put for the space of a year, as the most known and familiar aggregate of times; in the same way as ω_200 is used loosely and popularly for the parts of a day. Yet x25006 by itself is not a specific limited time. And, in fact, it may well be doubted whether x25000 ixavoi should be rendered, many years. It is a frequent error in lexicons, that if a Greek word can be rendered so as to make sense by any particular Latin word, they affirm that the two words have the same meaning; and hence the greatest monstrosities have sprung up in the lexicons, especially in respect to the prepositions. For who could ever be persuaded that ix signifies ad, in, and cum, or that iis could be de; àx0, ad and in, and xaxá, ex, &c.?

norance. Many such instances occur in the evangelic history. Luke ix. 33. John xiv. 5, 22. On such passages no doctrine can be founded, any more than on the fallacious averments of Job's friends; nor any criticism on the use of terms by the disciples, in a popular and inaccurate sense, except as to the usus loquendi.]—T.

Kαιζός always denotes a certain specific time, with the superadded notion of opportunity. (Ammonius says very accurately ὁ μὲν καιζὸς δηλοῦ ποιότητα χεόνου, χεόνος δὲ ποσύτητα.) For that which is done opportunely, is understood to be done at a certain period of time; while that which is done rashly, and not at a fixed time, is almost necessarily done inopportunely. Whence it occurs, that sometimes the word may be used indefinitely; and yet it may be gathered from the whole tenor of the address, what that is of which the καιζός is affirmed. So in Matth. xxvi. 18, ὁ καιζός μου ἐγγύς ἐστιν, the τοῦ ἀποθακικ

h See Du Cange Glossar. Med. et Inf. lat. and Hemsterhusius ad Aristoph. Phil. 1084.

is not, in fact, omitted, (for it is written i καιρός μου, and not merely, i καιρός,) but from the very time in which he gave this injunction to his disciples, it might have been known what was à xangós auroñ. But when xangós is combined with another word, then it does not denote the opportunity of the thing; but the whole formula does it, as xazeos σύχων, Mark xi. 13, παιξός τῶν καρτῶν, Matth. xxi. 34, where the lexicons very incorrectly render zazeós, the time of year. For zazgós denotes any opportunity whatsoever, not only of time, but of place, and of the apt and convenient means for doing any thing; as the notion of opportunity involves in it the notion of time. For, if the place is convenient for a certain act, then raigós sűraigós sor, that it should be done there. If the thing itself is fit and convenient, it may then be made use of. Wherefore, we must not at once condemn the views of some, regarding Mark xi. 13, οὐ γὰς ἦν καιρὸς σύκων, that it refers to the opportunity of place; (Abresch. Lect. Aristaenet. vol. i. p. 16, 17, Triller. ad Thom. Mag. p. 490.) if, indeed, it be necessary to vindicate our Lord's act at all. Nor, indeed, would the excuse be sufficient, that the place was not suitable to that kind of fruit: if we could, for a moment, imagine that our Lord, disappointed in his expectation, had acted in anger, a passion from which the divine mind is free. But, in fact, xaged is often said of any opportunity (as the Latins use tempora,) in which any thing can be conveniently done. I will also make one passing remark on the formula which occurs twice in the New Testament, Ephes. v. 16, and Coloss. iv. 5, ¿¿ayoçaζόμενοι του καιρόν. In both places the Apostle exhorts Christians to live prudently and cautiously; and, therefore, commands them ¿¿ayout Coodas of xaugór. Luther renders this, schicket euch in die Zeit. This gives the idea certainly. In my view, however, έξαγοράζεσθαι τον καιρόν, is, according to the manner of merchants who accurately examine goods, and choose the best, diligently to watch the time, and to make it our own, that we may over-rule or control it; as Pindar well says of Damophilus, Pyth. iv. ν. 509, ἐὖ νιν (τὸν καιρόν) ἔγνωκεν θεράπων δέ οἰ, οὐ δεάστας, δπαδεί. You are not to yield to time, and to serve it, but you may command it, and it shall do what you approve. And evidently this idea agrees best with the relation of both the passages.1

^{*} So also Rom. xii. 11, he renders the words of saigh behidowris, which reading, by the by, though admitted by Griesbach, has always appeared to me doubtful.

The same formula occurs in the LXX. Dan ii. 8. Lu-

But, since opportunity is generally fleeting, and of very short duration, as Pindar says, ό γαι καιρός πρός ανθρώπων βραχύ μέτρον έχει, therefore, πεδς καιεόν means, at a time, considered as no longer enduring than while the opportunity contemplated lasts; as Luke viii. 13, οἱ πρὸς καιρὸν miore borres, are they who believed for a time, while it was convenient, and no danger threatened; but εν καιεώ πειεασμοῦ ἀφίστανται. And now we may explain that singular formula, which occurs in Apoc. xii. 14, χαιρόν καλ καιρούς καλ ήμισυ zazeov. It is usually rendered, three years and a half; and rightly; for the same space of time is, in ver. 6, and c. xi. 3, spoken of, as ημέρας χιλίας διακοσίας έξήκοντα; and in xi. 2, μηνας πεσαράχοντα δύο. But that this number is used for any space of time, according to the Hebrew mode, is evident. (see Eichhorn on Apoc. xi. 2.) And, therefore, zaight, in this place, is not

ther renders it. "Ich sehe, dass ihr Frist suchet." But the idea is the same here also. "I know that you accurately watch the time." They knew that the king had forgotten his dream, and therefore, they asked him to tell it, not so much for the purpose of delay, as with a view to avoid the necessity of giving the interpretation. [The idea is, in my opinion, more directly expressed in the Chaldee, and well rendered in our English version. "I know that ye would gain the time." זבנין אנרתן זבנין emere, acquirere.]

— T.

a year, but is said of the time of a year. For there is a difference, when a word is predicated of this or that thing, and when it actually denotes that thing. It is used in Dan. vii. 25; xii. 7. The LXX rendersit (compare ver. 11.) not of actual years, but of a certain indefinite period of time, according to the usage of prophetic language; for as to the true sense, this formula means no more than, aliquamdiu, a good while. Compare James v. 17.

A similar reason obtains in respect to the word $\omega_{\ell}\alpha$. For, as $\omega_{\ell}\alpha$ properly denotes a definite and limited time, we may understand from this, why it may be predicated of any certain specific period, although custom has appropriated it specially to the hours of the day. Nor are they in the right, who say that it means the least portion of time. For in such passages as Matth. viii. 13; ix. 22; x. 19. Luke xii. 39, 46, no one would think that ωga was a moment or mere point of time, when it is evident that he who affirms an event to occur. ອ້າ ເກຼີ ພິຍຸຊ ຮ່ຽຍເທກ, means a more definite time than if he had said ἐν τῷ χρόνφ ἐκείνφ. And though agòs ωgar, may be rendered, a good while, in the same way as προς καιρόν, yet it were still incorrect to say that we means any minute portion of time. Certainly when a small part of time is intended, the word wear might be used, for it denotes a small part of the day; and therefore, Teds wear is the same as aliqued tempus, at some time; but it does not follow from this, that ώςα is, a little time, generally. There is a difference, however, between πεδς ωξαν and πεδς xaugóv. For that which is said to endure, mede igar, is conceived not to last longer than till the hour is expired, i. e. for only a short time; but that which is said to be done, πελς καιεόν, is conceived as being done precisely up to another point of time.

The LXX has rendered the Chaldee word της which properly means, time, by καιρὸς, as Dan. ii. 8. iii. 5, 15. vii. 12, Γως καιρῶς καὶ καιρῶς. the same word is also used for a year, in the iv. 13. vii. 25. xii. 7. And it is curious that the word which they have rendered in c. xii. 7. εἰς καιρῶ καὶ το μισο καιρῶς, in c. iii. 5, 15, they have rendered ὅςα. But it is possible, that both in Daniel and the Apocalypse, this description of an indefinite time may arise out of a religious reverence for the number seven divided into two parts; or, that it may be referred to that time during which the temple, after it was profaned by Antiochus, was deserted by the Jews. See Josephus Bel. Jud. i. 1, 2, proem. § 7. and 2. Mark x. 3. See Grotius on Daniel vii. 25.

ř

Another formula also differs from πρὸς καιρώ, viz. πρὸς τών καιρώ. It means, conveniently, as time shall permit. Lucian. i. Deor. Dial. iv. 209. The force of the article may be noticed in the formula, κατὰ καιρών Rom. v. 6. See Lucian, i.

Hermot. x. 749. xarà xaiço is, opportunely, in the needful time, to do it, that it be done rightly. When it is said that Christ xarà xaiço àxiê avi, it does not mean, at a time fixed of God, but at an opportune time, zur rechten Zeit; when we were àco siric. If a definite or appointed time were meant, it would have been xarà ro xaiço (aùroù.) The Greeks, almost in the same sense, use sic xaiço, opposed to ngò xaiçoù, 1 Cor. iv. 9. Kaiçò means, the moment of time, iça, a portion of time. Therefore, ngò xaiçò is, at some certain time, (auf eine gewisse Zeit) ngò agai, for a short time, (auf eine kurze Zeit.)

In Galatians ii. 5, πεδς ωςαν is ill rendered by some, as if it were the same as Teds xaied wear, 1 Thess ii. 17. For, πεδς καιεδν ωξας, is not, for a short time, but, for that time, that particular period in which ενέχο ψεν ήμᾶς ὁ Σατανᾶς. gives it correctly, eine Weile s. eine Zeit lang, aliquandiu, for some while, for a specific period. And, finally, aga, by itself, is never the opportune time, opportunity, as xaigós; but some word is added, to define and specify that which is uncertain in the notion of wea, time, as John ii. 4; xvi. 21; Mark xiv. 35; John xii. But these things are so manifest, that I need not add another word. And I know not how it is, that only in lexicons of the New Testament such trifling exists.

άμαρτία. άμάρτημα παράπτωμα άδικία: άνομία άδίκημα.

The discrimination of synonyms, which is t all times sufficiently difficult, is still more o in words applicable to disposition of mind. For as many virtues or vices are so nearly illied, that the difference cannot easily be pointed out, so the words which represent hem are frequently used indiscriminately. It is, however, often very desirable to trace with accuracy that difference. The words above written, so far agree that they have the common notion of sin generally, yet they differ. There is a greater degree of affinity between άμαςτία, άμάςτημα and παςάπτωμα. They involve the notion of vice or fault, which brings blame or injury. But in the first place τραστία and αμάρτημα, differ. For αμαρτία properly denotes the innate vice, from which the τμάςτημα springs." It is true that αμαςτία is in

[&]quot; It is worth while to endeavour to ascertain the real orce of the word ἀμαςτία, a word which, as Titmann states, s used repeatedly for the evil act, but which is also used amphatically, ἡ ἀμαςτία, for the evil principle. Its root or primitive in Greek is probably ἀμαςε which Scapula renders, a duct or canal for water, by which water may flow down apon any place. This will bring it into near connexion with the Hebrew root החול שונה אונה וו to speak or put forth, the New Testament used for the vicious act itself, as John viii. 21, 24; xvi. 8, 9; 2 Pet. i. 9, ii. 14; but the proper force of the word will be found in many places, especially in the seventh and eighth chapters of Romans. Neither would any one inconsiderately affirm, that in John i. 29, apagría had its specific signification. Certainly the Saviour took away not only external sins and iniquities, but in apagría the very corruption of the soul itself; for if this be not extirpated, mere propriety of outward conduct, which Melanchthon calls civil right-to cause to flow. The apagria may be regarded as a stream of influence, flowing down upon the human race. There is, however, another Hebrew word nearly allied to this: viz. שומר which not only carries the idea of an influence, but of an evil influence. In all the cognate dialects, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, it has the idea of turpidity and impure commixtion and excitement, muddy confusion in water, acetous fermentation in wine, bitumen arising from hot natural springs, collection of mud or clay brought down by tumultuous waters, bitter and brackish waters, &c. And from hence we derive the Latin amarus and the French amére. The apagria is then a defiling influence, a bitter principle, a principle of disturbance flowing down upon the moral creation of God. It may be noticed, in corroboration of this etymology, that the word amar repeatedly occurs in Gaelic, as a river channel, a mill-course, a ditch or canal.—T.

f Those places should be accurately distinguished from each other, in which is apageia or apageias occur.

eousness, would be utterly unavailing to real sanctity. In Rom. vii. 7, it is manifest that in the words, ὁ νόμος ἀμαρτία; ἀμαρτία is not the incitement to sin, but that which is in itself evil and vicious. Paul denies that the law is auagría, but concedes properly that the law excites to sin: χωρίς γάρ νόμου άμαρτία νεκρά. the whole argument in this chapter shows that apacría is not the sin or transgression, but the corruption which is by nature in the soul. Some say that # apagria is put collectively for all sins, as we say, die sünde. But it is evident in the view of the Apostle, that the άμαςτία is in us before the ἐπιθυμία; and that for a time sin was dead, but that when the law reigned, sin gave rise to lust and he became καθ' ὑπερβολήν άμαρτωλός. And therefore he does not understand apagría to be actual transgression, but, what all who know themselves must perceive, an innate corruption, and row Muor ris apagrias in sagai. And in Rom. v. 12, sq. it is scarcely to be doubted that a magria is = used in the same sense. The apagria which came by one man, di ivos. into the world, is disinguished from το τοῦ ἐνὸς παράπτωμα; and it is - not said, that by το παράπτωμα τοῦ ἐνός death came into the world, but άμαςτία, and by άμαςτία death, and that death came upon all men, for that all have sinned, which could not be said if death to all arose from the act of Adam. Also it may be said with correctness, ἀμαςτίαν οὐχ ἐλλογεῖσθαι, μὴ ὅντος νόμου, for it is νεκρὰ χωρίς τοῦ νόμου; but it could scarcely be said that sin is not imputed. For death reigned before Moses, (v. 14), seeing that all have sinned.

They then are not to be justified, who affirm that the sacred writers, not only in the same passage, but actually in the same formula, use the same word in two different senses. Such an ambiguity is utterly foreign to the simplicity of their writings. Even the frequent interpretation of Hebrews ix. 28, xwels άμαςτίας δφθήσεται, without a piacular sacrifice, is scarcely warrantable. Besides à μαςτία never denotes sacrifice for sins. For in Hebrews x. 6. όλοχαυτώματα καί περί άμαρτίας οὐκ ήθελησας, the expression is elliptical, and the full terms are θυσίαν (ε. προσφοράν v. 18.) περί άμαρτίας, i. e. sacrifice offered because of sin. And there is no confirmation of the false rendering obtained, by comparing it with Rom. viii. 4, weplas and auagrias, i. e. he sent his Son on account of sin, that he might condemn, xaraxeiry riv άμαρτίαν. Now πέμπειν περί τινος is so plainly to send on account of any thing, that it is wonderful to see interpreters attempting to bring any thing further out of so plain and simple an expression. But ἀμάρτημα is always used for the actual transgression. Mark iii. 28; iv. 12, Rom. iii. 25; 1 Cor. vi. 18. And παράπτωμα differs from both those former words: for although Jerome's distinction is not correct, that παζάπτωμα means the lapse towards sin, and άμαρτία, the completed act itself; yet in the word παζάπτωμα the notion inheres of sin rashly committed as by one unwilling to do an injury; but in auagria and auagrnua the act is expressed which he who does, does willingly whether he errs in improperly thinking that he is doing right, or whether he acts under the impulse of Elegantly therefore in Matth. vi. 14, 15; xviii. 35, the word παςάπτωμα is given in preference to the other two; for it is a milder term than auagria as applicable to a single fault. In Ephes. ii. 1, both words occur. And sometimes, in fact, παράπτωμα is used with reference to any transgression, as Rom. iv. 25; 2 Cor. v. 19. But in the important statement in Rom. v. 12, and following verses, the distinction between αμαςτία and παςάπτώμα had need to be accurately drawn; and Paul draws it. For the παρακοή of Adam he calls, παράπτωμα, v. 15, 17, 18, by which the ἀμαρτία came into the world; and in verse 20, he says

φρος, καθεισήλητι για κγνοιάση το καθάπτοιμα οδ θε έπλεώσασεν ή άμαρτία, υπερεπερίσσευσεν ή χάρις. But wherefore? why does he not say, of de extenses rd sugásrupa? Evidently because it is effected by the law, that those sinful acts which were less criminal, as the mere result of imprudence or of error, now might become more criminal, inasmuch as they who commit them, know themselves to be sinning. But he says, έπλεόνασεν ή αμαρτία for the αμαρτία αφορμήν λαβοῦσα διά τῆς ἐντολῆς makes the individual καθ' υπερβολήν άμαρτωλός. I am aware that too much stress must not be laid on these nice distinctions; yet it is certainly more satisfactory to follow out, in interpreting the sacred books, these delicate distinctions of the force of terms. than blindly to acquiesce in an ambiguous and misty interpretation. Paul, with the same accuracy of speech, very tenderly in Rom. xi. 11, when, speaking of the Jews rejecting Christ, calls that act ragarroua, which our Lord in John xvi. 9, calls ἀμαρτία. It would be a false interpretation to say, that παράπτωμα in this place means the same thing as hrrnua, which has reference to their misery.

P The etymology of the word fornus will not bear out the author's idea. It is derived from the Hebrew NOT.

ἀδικία, however, and ἀνομία differ from all the others. For in them the general notion only of transgression or fault exists. But these words involve the nature of the act, on account f which it is faulty. That is ἀδικία by which he δίκαιον is injured; that is ἀνομία by which he law is violated. For as he properly is δικος, who is not what he ought to be, and nerefore who violates right; so ἀδικία is said of ny impropriety which is repugnant to the καιον. So 1 John v. 17, πᾶσα ἀδικία ἀμαργία. But 1 ἀνομία the idea properly is the non-obserocare, errare, and which occurs in the same sense in riac and Chaldee. In Arabic also Las and . nd in the Ethiopic it is used not only in this sense, but in at which more commonly is attached to it in Greek, of ficit, indiguit, orbatus est. This etymology is confirmed so by the occurrence of the word in Greek, in both forms ἡστάομαι and ἡσσάομαι, a difference evidently originating the soft sound of M, in Hebrew, and L in Arabic, which des easily either into the o, or o. And in fact the domint idea of hora or hora is that of moral inferiority. รอง อไรอบ, ทั้งของ ที่อื่องอัง. Schleusner says, ที่ราฉังของ eleganter iis usurpatur, qui cupiditatibus pravis indulgent et vitioati serviunt. This, however, is the primary idea, and not, he states, secondary and derived The meaning therefore Harnum in the passage refered to, would be that of moral terioration or depression in consequence of fault. "If eir error be the riches of the world, and their degradation e enriching of the nations."-T vance or transgression of the law, whether the law be unknown or wilfully violated. ανομος, strictly speaking, who has not the law, Acts ii. 23. 1 Cor. ix. 21; and then subsequently who regards not the law, and who violates the law. ἀνομία is the violation of law. άδικία the doing contrary to right. And άδικία has the wider sense. It may be conceived of without a law, but there can be no arouia without adixía. See Xenoph. Memor. iv. 4. 12, 13. Finally, adianua is that which is done in adiana, which is unjustly done, Acts xviii. 14, xxiv. 20. Apoc. xviii. 5. Xenoph. Memorab. ii. 2, 3. αὶ πόλεις ἐπὶ τοῖς μεγίστοις ἀδικήμασι ζημίαν θάνατοι πεποιήπασιν, ώς οὐκ ὰν μείζονος κακοῦ Φὸβω την ἀδικίαι «TOZÚGOVEES»

CHAPTER IV.

ALL real adepts of the hermeneutic art have taught latterly, that, in interpreting old writings, not only must regard be had to the common usage of words, but that the extreme nicety of discernment consisted in noticing diligently the mode of speaking peculiar to each author. This remark is more abundantly confirmed, in the rendering of the New Testament. same time, the observance of it is combined with greater difficulties than has been generally supposed. For in other Greek writers, the more ornamented style was conformed to the more polished forms of speech, which, though they may undergo some change from diversity of dialect, follow as to the use of words a permanent and unwarying rule. But the style of the sacred writers, neither corrected by literary study, nor by the practice of writing adapted to the modes of general and popular thought and diction; and, as it were, overwhelmed by the greatness of those new announcements, for the expression of which all wonted language would appear inadequate, renders the observation of the use of words more difficult, and requires a more minute scrutiny than that of works more artificially composed. This remark, which is applicable in many respects, is peculiarly so with reference to the use of synonyms. For it was truly said, that he only could rightly understand and feel the elegance of the Greek writers, who could learn to distinguish the various shades of style, by means of the synonymous terms, as a delicate tint arising out of the intermixture of a multitude of subtle atomic particles. What then are we to do with those writers, of whom all agree that they were altogether strangers to those subtleties of composition; whilst many believe them to have been so barbarous, as scarcely to allow that they spoke the Greek language at all? Certainly if the sacred writers had no regard to the rules of the Greek language, especially to that of analogy, then their writings might be interpreted without any consideration of those rules; so that he might be accounted the best interpreter of Holy Scripture, who, neglecting the laws of Greek composition, should investigate this barbarous mode of speech by the opinions and customs of this age. But that is were a most improper mode of procedure, proved in a variety of ways, more especially the diligent observation of the synonymous rms; for this shows plainly that the style of e sacred writers, although very far from ssessing Attic elegance, and full of those fects which may always be detected in those 10 have acquired a language by actual use, ther than by study, abounds with acute ought and accuracy of expression; so that he 10 would attain to the full perception of the blimity of the sacred writers, which shines st conspicuously in their simplicity, would well to compare them with the compositions those authors who have thought and spoken st acutely.

And, in pursuing our inquiries, these sacred ys will direct our choice of the words best ited for observation. For the great truth lich, on the feast of our Lord's nativity, ristians would desire to commemorate, is ntained in John iii. 16: "God so loved, impose, the world that he gave his only begot1 Son," &c. Let us direct our attention there1 to this point, and consider what is the 1 ce of the word dyange which John uses, and what respect it differs from the cognate and gild.

'Αγαπάν φιλεῖν.

The accordance in some measure of these two words, is sufficiently plain. But some deny that they at all differ, on the ground that words which express the same affection of mind, are frequently used indiscriminately. That they differ, however, will appear from the fact, that each word has certain meanings peculiar to itself, and which the other will not admit. For if in both words the same precise idea existed, both would be used of the same things. But the usage is otherwise. For as $\varphi_i \lambda \epsilon \tilde{\rho}$ properly

4 Φίλος, from whence φιλιῖν, from φίω, or according to others from πίλω, to press, is he whom we embrace, kiss, cherish. Vid. Etymol. 794. 12.777. 778. Eustath. p. 1583-56. φιλιῖν τὸ ἀγατῷν καὶ τὸ τοῖς χείλισιν ἀσατζεσθαι, καὶ τὸ τὰ χείλη συμβάλλιν. conf. 1799. 51. Vid. Ev. Scheidius ad Lennep. Etymolog. p. 1063. But ἀγατῷν, which appears to be derived from ἀγάω, ἀγάπη, denotes properly the love that springs from admiration and veneration; and from this the other notions of the word flow, as to cherish, to receive kindly, to acquiesce, &c. Hesychius gives correctly, φιλιῖκατὰ ψυχὰν αγατῷ. It is evident, therefore, why friendship is called φιλία not ἀγάπη. It denotes an intimate union of souls.

[There is great probability that φιλιῦ, strictly to kiss, and πίω or πίνω, to drink, and πιθω to persuade, are all derivatives from τη, the mouth. And that ἀγαπαν, is derived from τη amare by the natural substitution of γ, as a harder sound for the mere aspiration τη. We find in several pasages of Scripture, the word τητης, amor, which, by the accommodation of the sound of the second radical to the style means, to kiss, and ἀγαπῷν never has this sense, so has ἀγαπῶν its peculiar meaning to be satisfied, to acquiesce, in which sense Piles is never used. Moreover, if these words were precisely similar, there would be no distinction made by the more elegant writers, as Xenophon, Plato and others. For although in the Memorab. ii. 7, 9, 12, they are twice apparently interchanged ου μέν έχεδας φιλήσεις—έχεδναι δέ σε άγασήσουση and a little further on, και αι μέν αὐτὸν ἐφίλουν, ὁ δὲ αὐτὰς ἡγάπα, yet he would greatly err, who should conclude that Xenophon thus unthinkingly interchanged words of synonymous import, because he had used both words vicissively of the same persons. For if we inspect the passage more accurately, we shall readily perceive why Socrates should say to a man anxious about the support of his poorer relations; Now when their indolence grieves you ours où insivaç pilsiç, ours insivas os; but if you would teach them to seek by labour to maintain themselves, σύ μέν έλεῖνας φιλήσεις, ὁρῶν ἀφελίμους σεαυτώ ούσας, έχειναι δε σε άγαπήσουσιν, αίσθόμεναι χαίροντά σε αὐταῖς. There existed no cause of of Greek pronunciation, would give at once the word ayan. And this etymology of the two words accords with the manifest distinction in their use. Oilsiv being used to express the more direct demonstration of regard, ayaras the principle, or internal feeling of delectation and kindliness .- T.\

mutual love: for neither could he love them who in their poverty were only an annovance to him, nor could they love him, when they saw him unwilling to support them. For there is no greater impediment to mutual love among relations, than the receiving of aid unwillingly given; or the being compelled to give to the undeserving. But if he obeyed the advice of Socrates, he might find that he would at length love them whom he had taught to be useful to himself, and that they might love him, when they perceived that he was no longer unwilling to take care of them. And then, that which Socrates predicted, took place, αί μεν ως κηδεμόνα έφίλουν, ο δε ως ωφελίμους ήγάπα. We admit, therefore, that Xenophon adopted the interchange of the words; but not blindly, or from a false regard to eloquence, which, by the mere variation of words, the imitators of ancient writers too eagerly sought. Certainly, if we rightly read the passage, Xenophon changed the terms, because he now wished to intimate what would occur after these women had understood that they would no longer be a burden to the man; and that he also now perceived some probable fruit of their labour. For now they could really love him who, as a parent, nourished them; he could affectionately regard them whom he saw worthy of his care. There is a similar passage in Dion. Cass. lib. xliv. ἐφιλήσατε αὐτὸν ὡς πατέρα, καλ ἡγαπήσατε ὡς εὐερ-But one, yet more important, occurs in Plato, Lysid. p. 215. A. "Ο δε μη άγαπῶτο, πῶς Φίλον; ὁ δε μή του δεόμενος, οὐδέ τι άγαπῷη ἄν; ὁ δε μή άγαπώη, οὐο ἄν φιλοῖ. It is clear that φιλεῖν denotes the sense of love, but in the word ἀγαπῷν properly is implied the cause of the φιλεδι. Properly, ayamar is to make much of any thing, to admire, either for utility sake, or some other reason, and then to wish well, to cherish, to regard; but piles denotes the love which takes its rise naturally from the thing loved. But since love is frequently without reason, it occurs, at times, that pilet is used in instances in which no just cause of love exists. 'Αγαπᾶν is never applied to an improper love.

In the New Testament, certainly, passages occur in which ἀγαπῷν and φιλεῖν are used indiscriminately; but there are others in which each is used in its own proper sense. Of the former class, are those in which Jesus is said φιλεῖν and ἀγαπῷν; and Luke xi. 43, ἀγαπᾶνε τήν πρωτοχαθεδρίαν, for which the Evangelist says, in c. xx. 46, φιλεῖν τὴν πρωτ. But we must not class with these John xxi. 15, where, to the question, ἀγαπῷς με πλεῖον τούτων, Peter replies, ναί χύριε, σù αίδας δτι φιλώ σε And our Lord twice repeats the words of Peter, pile? use i. e. dost thou so far love me? It is, however, worthy of observation, that in the New Testament, men are never said, φιλεῖν τὸν θεὸν, but ἄγαπῷν; but God is said both φιλεῖν and ἀγαπᾶν τοὺς ἀνθεώπους. For since, in the word φιλεῖν the direct affection of the mind is expressed, but in ayaπῶν the regard to any thing, as that which we venerate, it is the part of men ayamagi rdy Isin; but of God, both piles can be affirmed, with respect to men, if they do rightly, John xvi. 27; and αγαπᾶν, when he wishes them good, and seeks their salvation. So, in John iii. 16, where i αγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ is recorded, it is rightly said nyáπησεν ο θεος τον χόσμον, not εφίλει; for it could not be affirmed of God, that he pileiv ron xóopov, the world not being worthy of his love. Although it is used, therefore, when God is considered as approving men, yet an adequate cause is stated, or, at least, made apparent from the circumstances, v. c. John xvi. 27. In John xi. 3, 5, 36, speaking of our Lord's love to Lazarus, the words φιλεῖν and ἀγάπᾶν are interchang-For, in ver. 3, the sisters are recorded to have intimated to Jesus, or pileis, as Dever; and in ver. 36, it is said, that the men who saw his grief, said, ἴδε, πῶς ἐφίλει αὐτόκ Whilst. in ver.

on the ground, Lucian, i. Merced. Cond. 3. 655. περιμείναντες έζελχομένου και έμπεπηγότος, ήδη συρόμενον και πεδς ανάγκην αγόμενον δεάν. Speaking of a man, as of a fish caught by the hook, and dragged along. Conf. i. Catapl. 13. 635. ii. Luc. 56. 624. In the same sense, ouggons is used in Eurip. Rhes. v. 58. And so over is spoken of a continual impetus, as συρμόν χαλάζης, νιφετών, v. c. Leonid. Alex. Ep. xii. Anal. ii. 192. and πεηστήρων εξαισίους συρμούς, Aeschin. Axioch. § 17. Probably they differ, as our words zeihen and schleppen (zerren.) And, as German writers only use this word when it is peculiarly applicable to some act or work. (v. c. Schlepptau and die Schleppe, σύεμα,) so σύειν is seldom found in Greek writers, except when the idea of drawing is combined with violence. The notion of violence is not necessarily inherent in either word; but it becomes attached to objest, as it is inferred that the thing drawn, so follows as with reluctance or resistance, and as needing the application of a stronger force. The different notion is very evident in John xxi. ver. 6, 8, 11. For when the disciples, at their Lord's command, let down the net, oux ser aurd ελχύσαι ἴσχυσαν ἀπό τοῦ πλήθους τῶν ἰχθύρων. But afterwards came the others, and then it is said, σύροντες τὸ δίκτυον τῶν ἰχθύων. And, finally, when that we should actually love bad men. On the contrary, when they are reproved, who, from an excessive desire to preserve life, lose sight of the real object of living, John xii. 25, it is rightly said, ο φιλών την ψυχήν αύτου. For he who is άγαπών την ψυχήν, consults his real interest. But in Luke vii. 5, the Jews are recorded to have said, ἀγαπῷ τὸ ἔθνος ἡμῶν, i. e. favoured. cherished. Concerning Mark x. 21, à de Ingous nyteπησεν αὐτόν, interpreters have differed. But it is needless to invent a strange sense, as if ayara meant, to address with bland and friendly words, and then as nearly allied to it, to approve, to praise, which would rather be the force of pilin. Besides, if our Lord had approved of the young man, he would not have added, that one thing vet more trying and difficult to overcome remained. For, when our Lord saw that he was not ill-disposed, yet that he confided too much in his possessions, with a view to his benefit, he added an admonition to which his covetousness would not submit. Jesus, therefore, nyámnou airóv, that is, meaning kindly to him, warned the rich man, that he might, at the same time, impress more fully the minds of his disciples.

Briefly then, in fine, $\varphi_i \lambda_k \tilde{n}$ is to love, $\hat{\alpha}_i \gamma \alpha x \tilde{\varphi}_i$ is to regard; in Latin, the one is amare, and the other diligere, which two words differ in the γαιγόντες αὐτοὺς τοῖς στρατηγοῖς, εἶπον. In fact, σύρειν is never used in that sense in which idulus frequently is, that is, in the metaphorical sense in which it occurs in the above named passage in John, and in c. 12, ver. 32; and in which it is used by others. For, as ἐλκύων is frequently used of those who by speaking or other means attract others, that they may conform to their way; so in these passages it means no more than to attract, to influence; the opportunity being given to bring over to a side; which is not done by violence, (frequently associated with the idea of drawing;) but only by the rational inflexion of the will. So in Lucian, i. Pisc. 46. 613, he is said ἐλκόμενος πεὸς איי, who is moved by the sight of riches and indulgences proposed to him; and i. Hermot. 74. p. 817, ὑπὸ τῆς ἀκολουθίας ἐλκόμενος, is said of him who, under a false influence, believes that to be true which is false. In the same manner, in James i. 14, it is said, ὑπὸ τῆς ίδίας ἐπιθυμίας ἐξελπόμενος και δελεαζόμενος. (Conf. Aelian. Hist. Anim. vi. 31, and Aristaenet. Epist. ii. 21.) Hence it is used with reference to sporting, concerning animals who are taken not by force but by guile. But obgen is not so used; which is not surprising, if we are right in the idea that it rather means to drag warne, ὁ πίμν νας με, ἐλκύση αὐνόν. For, since the word ἐλκύεν is rendered trahere, to draw, they conceived that a notion of force was implied in it; at least, those who defended the notion of the irresistible grace of God, thought so; as if God led those who were predestined to salvation, even, notwithstanding their own reluctance, to faith in him. So even Calvin, following after Augustine, wrote: "Without controversy it is deducible from the words of John, that the hearts of the pious are so effectually governed by divine grace, that they follow with an inflexible affection." And, although they had

'This point is not easily settled, even by the acute criticism of Mr. Titmann. Men are too easily biassed by their own predilections. For instance, in this very passage of Calvin's Institutes, on which Titmann seizes, in order to controvert the notion of a constrained reluctance on the part of the elect, it is evident that no such idea exists, or was intended to be expressed. It only affirms an invincible influence on the hearts of the pious. It assumes the pious turn and tendency, as co-existing with, coeval with, the influence: and this excludes the idea of reluctance and unwillingness, co-existing with the operations of effective grace. It shuts out the idea of dragging altogether. So difficult is it to settle controversial points, when, even with reference to the force of terms, a writer of such peculiar acuteness misses the plain and direct meaning of his opponent. Surely there is little more affirmed in this sentence, given, as it is, in an insulated form from the writings of Calvin, than that the authentic interpretation of those former words given in ver. 65, whence it might be gathered that they meant only idv μη η δεδομένου αὐτῷ ἐκ τοῦ πατζός μου, yet they adhered to this notion of dragging, and, therefore, taught that he to whom God gave the grace to come to him, was so controlled that he could not resist, and that this was given only to the elect. Our theologians, who teach the universal grace of God, regarding it as a thing which may be resisted, maintain, that in the word ἐλκύειν there is not necessarily the idea of a certain constraint on the resisting and unwilling, but only the notion of leading and attracting. Which,

"They (i. e. the predestined to life) be called according to God's purpose, by his spirit working in due season; they, through grace, obey the calling, they are justified freely, they are made the sons of God by adoption, they are made like the image of his only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ, they walk religiously in good works; and, at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity." Art. 17 of the Church of England. Neither in the terms of this article, nor in the above extract from Calvin, does the idea exist, which Titmann condemns, with justice, as unscriptural, of a divine violence dragging a still reluctant heart to a worship, half-sincere and half involuntary.—T.

* Most probably we are right, in tracing iaxin, Taxe, to 1777, ambulavit, ivit, ire fecit, deducit. It has the same sense also in all the cognate dialects. It occurs also in Chaldee, in the sense of vectigal, tribute drawn, and of the motions of the planets. The same general idea obtains as it may be shown by many passages of the Greek writers, so especially will it be made to appear, if the word is compared with over, which is its synonym.

In this respect the two words agree, that in both of them there is the idea of drawing; i. e. of effecting that some thing, moved from its own place, should follow another. In this sense ελκύειν, (which very frequently means only to carry along with, as in Euripid. Ion. v. 750.) is used in John xviii. 10; xxi. 6, 11. But so far they appear to differ, that in the word ελκύειν may be understood a certain drawing, tending to a particular point; in the word σύχειν, a continuous and uninterrupted movement of the thing drawn. Wherefore, σύχειν is frequently used of those things which are drawn perpetually in Greek. It is used of the weight causing the scale to descend; and of any attractive influence by which one thing is caused to move towards another. So also *\lambda \tilde{\sigma}_6' derived from it, is the track or course along which any thing has passed, as the plough, a vessel, a serpent, an arrow. The oriental word has reached us through the Gothic migration, in the German, walch, peregrinus. (Walachia?) and our own word, retaining the primitive sense, to walk. This etymology of inxin quite justifies the author's critical remarks on it. The word oven, may be referred to \text{\text{Tip}}, decessit, amovit, detraxit. In inxin, the original idea is, influence causing motion; in oven the leading notion is, separation, aversion—T.

n the ground, Lucian, i. Merced. Cond. 3. 55. περιμείναντες έξελχομένου καλ έμπεπηγότος, ήδη ιρόμενον καλ πρός άνάγκην άγόμενον όρᾶν. Speaking f a man, as of a fish caught by the hook, and ragged along. Conf. i. Catapl. 13. 635. ii. Luc. In the same sense, σύρδην is used in 6. 624. Eurip. Rhes. v. 58. And so over is spoken f a continual impetus, as συρμόν χαλάζης, νιφετών, . c. Leonid. Alex. Ep. xii. Anal. ii. 192. and gηστήςων έξαισίους συςμούς, Aeschin. Axioch. § 17. robably they differ, as our words zeihen and chleppen (zerren.) And, as German writers nly use this word when it is peculiarly appliable to some act or work. (v. c. Schlepptau and ie Schleppe, σύρμα,) so σύρων is seldom found n Greek writers, except when the idea of rawing is combined with violence. The noion of violence is not necessarily inherent in ither word; but it becomes attached to ougest, s it is inferred that the thing drawn, so follows s with reluctance or resistance, and as needng the application of a stronger force. ifferent notion is very evident in John xxi. er. 6, 8, 11. For when the disciples, at their ord's command, let down the net, oux ser aved λχύσαι ἴσχυσαν άπὸ τοῦ πλήθους τῶν ἰχθύρων. fterwards came the others, and then it is said, ύροντες τὸ δίκτυον τῶν ἰχθύων. And, finally, when they were landed, Peter शेत्राज्य न्हे ठींप्रनावन देवा नह γης. Where it may be readily seen why, in the second instance, John uses the word ofen. Nor can we say that both words are used concerning the same thing in the same sense, in Acts xvi. 19, είλχυσαν είς την άγοράν; Acts xxi. 30, είλχον αὐτὸν ἔξω τοῦ ἰεροῦ; James ii. 6, έλχουση υμας είς τα κειτηεία; and Acts viii. 3, σύρων τε αδρας και γυναϊκας παρεδίδου είς φυλακήν Acts xiv. 19, ἔσυρον ἔζω τῆς πόλεως Acts xvii. 6, εσυρον ἐπί τοὺς πολιτάςχας. Certainly in the former passages there is not the notion of violence, but only that of efficacy, which cannot be separated from the idea of drawing. Often they are said to draw, who would prefer that the thing which they draw, as chains, calamities, &c. should not The same form occurs in ελχύειν πόδα. and others; whence it appears that in this word there exists only the simple notion of drawing, independently of the additional idea of violence, which is only adventitious, arising out of the circumstances. Nor in the form in κύειν είς την άγοράν, είς κριτήριον, is there the notion of violence; as if the lictors were actually dragging the man to the forum, any more than in the Latin expression, in jus rapere. Which appears sufficiently in Acts xvi. 19, είλχυσαν είς την άγος αν έπι τους άςχοντας και προσαγαγόντες αὐτοὺς τοῖς στρατηγοῖς, εἶπον. In fact, σύρειν is never used in that sense in which ἐλκύων frequently is, that is, in the metaphorical sense in which it occurs in the above named passage in John, and in c. 12. ver. 32: and in which it is used by others. For, as ελχύων is frequently used of those who by speaking or other means attract others, that they may conform to their way; so in these passages it means no more than to attract, to influence; the opportunity being given to bring over to a side; which is not done by violence, (frequently associated with the idea of drawing;) but only by the rational inflexion of the will. So in Lucian, i. Pisc. 46. 613, he is said ἐλκόμενος πρὸς who is moved by the sight of riches and indulgences proposed to him; and i. Hermot. 74. p. 817, ὑπὸ τῆς ἀκολουθίας ἐλκόμενος, is said of him who, under a false influence, believes that to be true which is false. same manner, in James i. 14, it is said, ὑπὸ τῆς ίδιας έπιθυμίας έξελκόμενος και δελεαζόμενος. (Conf. Aelian. Hist. Anim. vi. 31, and Aristaenet. Epist. ii. 21.) Hence it is used with reference to sporting, concerning animals who are taken not by force but by guile. But object is not so used; which is not surprising, if we are right in the idea that it rather means to drag after; (whence σύρμα and ἐπισύρειν;) whilst in Rev. xii. 4, ἐλκειν and ἐλκύειν mean, to draw to, or with. And, therefore, if the compounds of σύρειν are not used strictly, they will not have the notion of drawing to, but of drawing away, driving, propelling. As Lucian elegantly says I. Nigrin. 16. p. 55, παρασύρεια αἰδὰς καὶ ἀρετὴ καὶ δίκαιοσύνη. For παρασύρειν and περισύρειν are applied to rivers or torrents, which with swollen waters drag down all opposing substances before them. (See Hemsterhusius on this passage of Lucian.)

Καινός νέος,

Agree in this, that both are opposed to παλαιός. But in παλαιός there are two ideas; it is used of that which was originated some time back, as οἶνος παλαιός, Luke v. 39, or of that which has existed long, and been in use, ἰμάτιον παλαιόν, Matth. ix. 16. To the first sense νέος is opposed; to the last καινός. That is καινόν which comes in the place of a thing that was formerly, and has not yet been used, i. e. new; νέος is that which has only lately been originated, recent.

That in the New Testament this notion of each word is distinctly preserved, appears from the references given in Lexicons. We will adduce a few instances: Matth. ix. 16. 17, εμάτιον παλαιόν - πλήρωμα καινόν οίνον νέον - άσκοὺς Taλαιούς - καινούς. (conf. Mark ii. 21; Luke v. 36). Our Lord does not say vious addition, nor olvov zasvóv. But in Matth. xxvi. 29, he says, γέννημα της αμπέλου καινόν, because he refers to another wine than that which he poured out then to his friends, not recent but different. For, as in the word zavis is expressed that which has not been long, it follows that it must be other and different from that which had been formerly. And we also, in speaking of wine, draw the distinction between new wine and recent wine. Hence, the γλωσσαι καιναί in Mark xvi. 17, i. e. tongues not formerly used by the Apostles, are, in Acts ii. 4, called irigas, other tongues. Some add to this the notion of superiority; but it does not necessarily exist in xanós, although it frequently arises out of the opposite term; for often that which is worn by use is corrupted by age. Yet the vior and the xarvior are not always better than the older. Therefore, neither in the formula καίνόν άμπέλου γέννημα does the notion of superiority exist absolutely, nor in these: - xairi dia Inan, Heb. viii. 8. 13; ix. 15. xανη έντολή. John xiv. 34.

But καινός and νέος are used interchangeably with the same word. For instance, καινή διαθήκη and νέα διαθήκη Heb. xii. 24; καινός ἄνθεωπος Eph.

ii. 15; iv. 23. et vios av Sewnos Col. iii. 10. But although, zawi dia Inxn is always used, regard being had to the old covenants; it is once only in this passage called via, as a recent covenant only lately established, of which the Jews were now participants. For the same reason Paul in Epist. to Colossians, speaks of the min aνθεωπος, when he had been wont to say, xamis For it is evident that regard is especially had in this place to the avaysvenous: the xame and some is one who differs from the former; the νέος one which is ανακαινούμενος κατ' είκονα το xrίσανπος αὐτὸν, renewed after the image of his Creator. On the contrary, Paul does not say, νέα κτίσις but καινή (2 Cor. v. 15, 17; Gal. vi. 15, Eph. ii. 15,) because in the word xrious it self, there is the notion of vedtys, newness. And the difference of which we speak may be observed in the use of the words avaxavous and άνανεοῦν, which occur in the New Testament They are both rendered, to restore, to renew: yet they differ. For who does not see in ? Cor. iv. 16, ὁ ἔσωθεν ἄνθεωπος ἀνακαινοῦται ἡμέρα κα nuises, that the meaning is different from wha it would have been, if the Apostle had written avareouras. On the contrary, in Eph. iv. 23, i was correct to write ε πνεοῦσθαι τῷ πνεύματι το κοὸς ὑμῶν. For if in this latter passage he has in 1 Pet. iii. 4, τοῦ πραέος καλ ήσυχίου ανεύματος. Hence, ήσυχάζειν is to rest, to do nothing; and it is said of those who make no reply, nor contradict further, as Luke xiv. 3. Acts xi. 18. xxi. 14. and 2 Thess. iii. 12. Paul exhorts those μεθ' ήσυχίας έργάζεσθαι, τον έαυτῶν ἄρτον έσθίοντας, whom he heard ατάπτως περιπατείν, μηδεν ἐργαζομένους, ἀλλὰ περιεργαζομένους, i. e. meddling with the affairs of others. (Aristid. p. 494.) ήσυχίαν ήγε και μηδέν περιειργάζετο. It is evident that houxía is frequently used in the sense of silence, 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12, compared with 1 Cor. xiv. 34. "Hespes is seldom used; but the more common forms ήρεμα, ήρεμαῖος, ήρεμεῖν, igeμίζειν, have the meaning which we have specified; although in these words the notion of tranquillity is often referred to external things; for he who is himself quiet, i. e. free from fear or other disturbing passions, does not annoy others. And hence ήσύχιος is often used in both senses. We will add a passage from placid life according with the desires and wishes, quiets fruens; it is rather a pleasurable repose. "Heims is from III, nudus, vacuus, evacuatus, cava, spelunca. From the same source is derived $i_{\xi\eta\mu\rho\delta}$, desert, and the words, eremite, Hermit. And the idea, therefore, which is conveyed by $\tilde{\eta}_{\xi}(\mu\rho\delta)$ is rather that of vacuity of cares, freedom from annoyance, the quiet of solitude.—T.

CHAPTER V.

An accurate observation of synonyms is peculiarly useful and necessary, in cases where they occur in juxtaposition. This fact occurs in all writers, but is especially worthy of notice in the books of the New Testament, and that on two accounts; first, because some think that this conjunction of synonyms may be neglected in studying the writings of less elegant authors; and, secondly, that many, in those places in which this accumulated junction of synonymous terms occur, have been accustomed to look for some emphasis or ornament. Both opinions, however, are false. For it is plain, that men who have acquired the language that they speak rather by custom than by study, more frequently make use of particular terms, which, taken together, go to express the universal or general notion present in their minds; whence it happens that the full force of their meaning must be gathered from a close consideration of the whole synonymous terms which they have used, collectively. And the notion about ornament is equally unfounded.

For, as the most elegant writers abstain from that kind of ornament which is merely verbal, so also should we take care, lest, in reading more simple writers, we conclude that words cognate as to a certain similitude of meaning, are introduced merely for ornament. is common enough to rapid writers to adopt a verbose style, which gratifies the idle and listless reader, but gives disgust to a better taste. But more elegant authors never insert a word, except its sense is fitted to impart some new light or additional view to the subject; and which pleases, because it leads the mind to consider the same point in various ways; so that the same topic, presented in different aspects, calls up in the mind of the reader different ideas respecting it. But less artificial writers, who are chiefly anxious to be understood by their readers, often use sentences of similar import or synonymous terms near together, not for the sake of ornament or variety, but that their readers may more fully apprehend the whole idea which they wish to convey."

^{*} I conceive this to be the primary source of that parallelism which is so celebrated among the Hebrew writers, especially in their poetical books, but in what mode, or by what laws, it is regulated, has not been shown with sufficient accuracy. For that which Herder has written in his work, (vom Geist

Hence not only among the New Testament writers, but among the more ancient Greek authors, and especially Homer, many passages occur in which synonymous words or sentences appear together; yet in vain would you seek for any intentional ornament, except that clearness which flows naturally from an accurate description of particular things, from which a general notion is derived. Yet they give pleasure, although not inserted by the author with that view; for although the enjoyment derived from mere ornament, would be lost if the writer abstained from the ornament, yet readers would not the less distinctly apprehend his meaning. But, in passages of this kind, the pleasure arises from this, that the writer has exhibited the matter by various terms of description to the eyes of the reader, not merely to please him, but to state more precisely his own way of thinking about it.

Before we demonstrate this by examples from the New Testament, it may be well to adduce a few instances from the writings of Homer, which will clearly illustrate my meaning; and of the many that immediately suggest der hebr. Poesie, Tom. I. Opp. p. 34. sqq.) has well explained the beauty and force of such parallelism, but has not entered on the inquiry into its nature.

I will select those to which themselves. parallel cases may be found in the New Testament, μίνυνθά πες ουτι μάλα δήν. Iliad. α. 416. et saep. ήμος δ' ήέλιος κατέδυ και έπι κνέφας ήλθε Iliad. α. 475. μέγα χήδεται ήδ' ελεαίζει. Iliad. β. 27. υπίσχετο και κατένευσεν. Iliad. β. 112. οঁ√ιμον όψιτέλεστον. Iliad. β. 325. νικήση κρείσσων τε γένηται. Iliad. γ. 92. αἴσχεα δειδιότες και δνείδεα πόλλ' α μω έστίν ib. 242. άβλητος και ανούταιτος, Iliad. δ. 540. ημβροτες οὐδ ἔτυχες, Iliad. ε. 287. έλως και κύρμα ib. 488. βανεῖν καὶ πότμον ἐπισπεῖν Iliad. η. 52. Βάνατον και πότμον ἐπισπεῖν, Iliad. υ. 337, μύθω έπιτέλλεαι ήδε κελεύεις. Iliad. κ. 61. κραδίη και θυμός άγήνως, ibid. v. 220. 244. 319. (It only occurs in the Iliad in this instance, but in the Odyss. δ, 348. σ, 60.) ούτι μετατρέπομ' ούτ' άλεγίζω. Iliad. μ. 238. πόλεμον και δηϊότητα. Iliad. ν. 250. πολεμίζειν ήδε μάχεσθαι. Hiad. λ. 12. υπέμειναν οὐδ έφόβηθεν. Iliad. ε. 499. σῆσιν ἔχε φρεσί, μηδέ σε λήθη αἰρείτω. Iliad. β. 33. οὖτ' εἴρομαι οὖτε μεταλλῶ. Iliad. a. 553. In these passages any one will perceive, that there is no ornament nor any particular emphasis; yet we deny that this union of synonymous terms is altogether otiose and Similar instances occur among more elegant writers, which need not be enumerated; and they are found also in the sacred

^{*} We may subjoin a few passages, not dissimilar to those writings. In following out, therefore, this discussion on the synonyms of the New Testament which we have begun, we must seek from passages of a similar kind, some examples in order to demonstrate what course, in our opinion, should be taken, to ascertain the real mind of the writer, and to define accurately the force of his synonymous expressions.

ήρεμος ήσύχιος.

Paul writes in 1 Tim. ii. 2. ha ñgeμων καὶ ἡούχιον βίον διάγωμεν; and correctly; for both are to be desired; for the two words agree in this, that in neither is there any thing of tumult, perturbation, agitation or solicitude; yet they differ. He is ἡούχιος who makes no disturbance; he is ἥgeμως who is himself free from agitation or disturbance. That life therefore is ἡούχιος which excites no disturbance in others; and that is ἥgeμως which is not disturbed by others. Hoύχιος is evidently used in this sense of which we are about to speak. The following occur in λenophon: σώματα κάκιστα καὶ αἴσχιστα, ('yneg, 13. 11, κακῶν καὶ ἀνάνδρων, Lyc. 10. 6, ἀνοήτων καὶ ῥιψοκιδύνων, Memor. 1. 3, 9, ἀχειῖον καὶ ἀνωφιλὶς τοῦ σώματος, ib: 1. 2. 54, ἀπόρων καὶ ἀμηχάνων, ib. 2. 5. 3, ἀμίλιων καὶ ἡαθυμίαν, ib. 3. 5. 5, παιδιυθίντας καὶ μαθόντας, opposed to ἀπαιδιύτον καὶ ἀμαθεῖς, ib. 4. 1. 4.

The word ἀσύχια is derived from pm amavit, appetivit, desiderium, and is, therefore, vita tranquilla, placida; *

in 1 Pet. iii. 4, τοῦ πραέος καλ ἡσυχίου πνεύματος. Hence, ήσυχάζειν is to rest, to do nothing; and it is said of those who make no reply, nor contradict further, as Luke xiv. 3. Acts xi. 18. xxi. 14. and 2 Thess. iii. 12. Paul exhorts those μεθ' ήσυχίας έργάζεσθαι, τον έαυτων άρτον έσθίοντας, whom he heard απάπτως περιπατείν, μηδέν έργαζομένους, άλλα περιεργαζομένους, i. e. meddling with the affairs of others. (Aristid. p. 494.) ήσυχίαν ήγε και μηδέν περιειργάζετο. It is evident that iouxía is frequently used in the sense of silence, 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12, compared with 1 Cor. xiv. 34. "Heemos is seldom used; but the more common forms ήρεμα, ήρεμαῖος, ήρεμεῖν, igeμίζειν, have the meaning which we have specified; although in these words the notion of tranquillity is often referred to external things; for he who is himself quiet, i. e. free from fear or other disturbing passions, does not annov others. And hence ήσύχιος is often used in both senses. We will add a passage from placid life according with the desires and wishes, quiets fruens; it is rather a pleasurable repose. "Heimos is from my, and my, nudus, vacuus, evacuatus, cava, spelunca. From the same source is derived ignmos, desert, and the words, eremite, Hermit. And the idea, therefore, which is conveyed by heimos is rather that of vacuity of cares, freedom from unmoyance, the quiet of solitude.—T.

Lucian, ii. Amor. 29. 429. ἐγὰ δὲ ἡσυχῆ μειδιάσας καὶ ἡρέμα τὰ ὁρθαλμὰ παραβαλὰν (ὅμμα ῆσυχον, Euripid. Orest. 1217. Troad. 649.) They are in error who say that ἡρεμος is the same as ἡμερος. But Luther elegantly renders the words of Paul in the passage in question; ein geruhiges und stilles Leben. For although we also use the words ruhe, ruhig, and stille, still, promiscuously; yet that a similar difference exists between them is made evident by those formulae, which necessarily require the one rather than the other.

μάχεσθαι πολεμεῖν μάχαι πόλεμοι.

Among the former quotations from Homer, we gave πολεμίζειν ήδε μάχεσθαι. We must add to it πόλεμοί τε μάχαι τε· Iliad. α. 177. ε, 891. On the former passage Eustathius says, τό πόλεμοί τε μάχαι τε, ἢ ἐκ παραλλήλον δηλοῖ τὸ αὐτὸ, ἢ καὶ διαφορά τις ἔστι ταῖς λέξεσιν, εἴγε μάχεται μέν τις καὶ λόγοις, ὡς καὶ ἡ λογομαχία δηλοῖ καὶ αυτὸς δε ὁ ποιητὴς μετ' ὁλίγα φησὶ, μαχεσσαμένω ἐπέεσσι. (v. 304.) καὶ ἄλλως δὲ μάχη μὲν, αὐτὴ ἡ τῶν ἄνδρων συνειςβολή. ὁ δὲ πόλεμος καὶ ἐπὶ παρατάξεων καὶ μαχίμου καιρῶ λέγεται. χρήσιμον δὲ ὧδε καὶ τὸ πολεμίζειν ἡδὲ μάχεσθαι. And this view of Eustathius is confirmed by other writers, and by the Scriptures especially. Paul in 2 Tim. ii. 23, commands τὰς μωμάς ζητήσεις παραιτεῖν, δτι γεννῶσι μάχας. In the same way he exhorts Titus, iii. 9, μωςὰς δὶ ζητήσεις, καὶ γενεωλογίας, καὶ ἔρεις καὶ μάχας νομικὰς περιτοτασο. In 2 Corinth. vii. 5, the αὶ ἔξωθει μάχαι are not bodily calamities, but the actual contentions with which the Apostle had to encounter. Compare John vi. 52; 2 Tim. ii. 24; Act. vii. 26, (Exod. ii. 13. [73].) Πόλεμος, on the contrary, and πολεμίζειν are said of battles and combats, which take place in the way of actual collision. The word is so used, metaphorically, certainly in Rev. ii. 16, πολεμήσω μετ' αὐτῶν ἐν τῆ ἔρυφαία τοῦ στόματός μου. (comp. v. 12.) But it is never applied to verbal disputes.

So far then they agree, that they denote contest, contention, fighting; but πόλεμος and πολεμοῦ are restricted to actual collision by physical force, μάχη and μάχεοθαι apply to any contention of mind as well as body, even though it come not to blows. In the former the actual struggle is expressed; in the latter, it is sufficient to have the idea of such contention as often leads to blows. For in the word μάχεοθαι there is not properly and necessarily the notion of physical collision, as appears from one passage of Homer. (Iliad. α, 298.) χιρο μιν ουτι ἔγωγε μαχήσομαι είνεκα κούρης. Ι strongly suspect that the original notion of this word was that of impetus, or force by which one rushes on another; wherein the verb has only a middle termination. Hence $\mu\dot{\alpha}\chi^{z_0}\partial^{z_0}$ $\tau\dot{n}$ simply rendered, is to be borne violently against any one, as Iliad. ζ , 329. $\mu\dot{\alpha}\chi^{z_0}$ and $\tilde{\epsilon}_{p}^{i}\partial^{z_0}$ are often joined as in the Iliad. α , 177. ϵ , 891. Xenoph. Hier. i. 38. $\mu\alpha\chi^{\eta}$ and $\mu\dot{\alpha}\chi^{z_0}\partial^{z_0}$ have a wide signification. $\pi\dot{\epsilon}\lambda^{z_0}\mu\dot{\epsilon}_{0}$ and $\pi\dot{\epsilon}\lambda^{z_0}\mu\dot{\epsilon}_{0}$ are restricted to the idea of war.

The suspicion of Titmann is well founded: and this instance again illustrates the value of etymological inquiry. The original form of maxn is more directly that of actual collision, than πόλεμος. It is derived from [7], to smite; which according to the form of all Hebrew words beginning with 1, drops the first radical, and takes the formative 7: סכים, percutientes חבום, percutiens. With a slight variation it occurs in Chaldee 2773 and 7773, percussit and in Arabic and hence μαχαιρα, a sword, mactare to slav, and dimicare to fight. From the same source, we have nocuit in Latin; and knock, through the Gothic. questionably, therefore, the original notion of maxe is a blow. medianin has reference rather to the general confusion of an extended contest, and is probably derived from 553, confudit, miscuit. It was very natural for μάχη, which more simply expresses the idea of contest by collision, to be used in a figurative sense for every kind of conflict. natural course of language. wolipsiv originally expressed a more complex idea, and has been retained by custom in its proper meaning. Phavorinus, however, says : wolenifur idi σύμψυχοι τὸ αὐτὸ (τὸ ἔν φρονοῦντες.)

The passage in which these expressions oczur, is Philip. ii. 2. Πληρώσατέ μου την χαράν, Ινα ο αὐτο φρονήτε, την άὐτην άγάπην έχοντες, σύμψυχοι, τὸ 'ν Φρονουντες. The word σύμψυχος occurs but once in the New Testament. It differs from σόψυχος, which Paul used in the same epistle, 2 ii. 20. For ἰσόψυχος is animated or moved n the same way; σύμψυχος, to think the same thing, to be of one mind. They may be objection. ψυχω who are not iσ6ψυχω. For often men think the same thing, who differ materially as to mind. The σύμψυχω, are the same with oi rd aurd peonouvers. But we must inquire into the difference between rd aurd provent and rd in provent. For it cannot be credited that the Apostle would have so rashly introduced a mere tautology. Once only he writes To En peopers, and that in this passage. Sixtimes he writes to auto prover. Now, rd aurd peoper is to have the same opinion, to feel, to wish, to seek the same thing. Romans xii. 16, τὸ αὐτὸ εἰς ἀλλήλους φεονοῦντες Rom. xv. 5, το αυτό φρονείν έν άλλήλοις 2 Cor. xiii. 11, To auro ogovere, eignveiters. And again, in the Epistle to the Philippians, c. iii. 16, τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν καιδνι, τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, if that is the true reading; and iv. 2, to auto provess in xuriw. We need hardly attempt to demonstrate that this formula is used by other writers in the same sense. But to sir provein, is to wish one thing only, to agree in seeking one thing only. The Apostle wishes the Philippians rd aurd ogoviì, i. e. not to disagree, but to regard each other with the same mutual love, to be unanimous, seeking one thing. For, if each sought something different, they could neither be σύμψυχοι, nor would they have την αὐτην ἀγάπη. But the one thing () which he wished them all to mind, he explains in ver. 4, un ra έαυτων έχαστος σχοπούντες, άλλά χαι τὰ έτερων έχαστος. He wishes, therefore, all συμψύχους είναι, πὸ έν φρονοῦντας, while all minded or sought one thing only, the convenience of each other. For, if οί πάντες τὰ ἐαυτῶν ζητοῦσι, ver. 20, they could not be accordant; but if all agreed in one thing, that each should expressly seek the benefit of the others, they would certainly live in concord and in mutual love.

Briefly, then, $r \delta$ a dr δ φ g φ e i i i to have the same mind; $\sigma \delta \mu \psi \nu \chi \sigma \nu \epsilon i \nu \omega i$, is to think the same thing, to be of accordant mind; $r \delta \delta \nu \rho g \sigma \nu i$, is not to differ in council and purpose, but to seek one and the same object.

σπλάγχνα· οἰκτιςμοι.

In the same clause of the Epistle to the Philippians, ver. 1, we read, εἴ τινα σπλάγχνα καὶ οἰκτιρμοὶ, πληςώσατε μου τὴν χαςάν. If it were true, as is stated in the common lexicons to the

New Testament, that σπλάγχνα is put metaphorically for mercy, commiseration, Paul would have written tautologically. But that the word has a wider meaning, and that the notion of mercy only attaches to it adventitiously, will appear from Luke i. 78, σπλάγχνα έλέους, and Coloss. iii. 12, σπλάγχνα οἰκτιεμιῶν. Certainly, as σπλάγχνα properly signifies the more noble viscera, the heart, lungs, liver, &c. (σπλάγχνον ή καςδία,) whence, εὔσπλαγχνοι and εὐσπλαγχνια, are terms for fortitude, so are all these terms figuratively assumed to express the more vehement feelings and passions, which are believed to arise more immediately from these viscera. Hence σπλάγχνα θερμαίνειν πρός δργήν, Aristoph. Ran. v. 868, and αἰνιᾶν σπλάγχνον Sophocl. Ajac. v. 995. And thus, the ἄσπλαγχνοι are those who are destitute either of love and benevolence, or of hate and anger, we will divated now ὑπάργοντες, κατά τὸ μηδὲν ἔχειν ἔνδον συναλγοῦν. - μή έλεοῦντες μηδένα, μέτε Φιλοῦντες, μηδ όλως Φροντίζοντες η έπαινούντων η ψεγόντων, η άδικούντων, η ώφελούντων. (Galen. de Dogm. Hippocr. et Plat. iii. c. 4. Tom. v. Opp. 316. ed Lips. we say herzlos, heartless.) Luther renders σπλάγχνα ἐλέους, by herzliche Barmherziakeit and σπλάγχνα οἰκτιρμῶν herzliches Erbarmen.

There is then a difference between σπλάγχνα and σίκτισμοί. The former denotes some vehement affection or regard, στόςγή, as of parents towards children, which is the most intense affection, and on which account children are called σπλάγχνα in Philem. v. 12; and often elsewhere. The latter properly denotes mercy, a sense of grief for the distresses of others. These words of Paul should be rendered, therefore, If ye have any true love towards me, if any mercy. Luther writes, herzliche Liebe und Barmherzigheit.

Let us now speak of the synonyms,

šλεος οίπτιςμός ἐλεεῖν οἰπτείρειν·

Oixrigen and oixrigués denote merely compassion, a sense of unhappiness for the ills of others, barmherzig seyn. Barmherzigheit, Mitleiden; but ëles, èlesé, denote the desire of relieving the miserable. In these latter, then, there is something more than in the former, viz: the additional notion of beneficence, of aid, which he who is èlesé is prompt to apply. Pity is easily enough called up in the soul, but the ëlesé is less frequently to be met with.

^{*} This is perhaps assumed too easily. The Apostle uses a strong expression indicative of his love to Timothy, but it would not follow from this, that the word which he uses means children, or, my child; Theophylact thus paraphrases the passage: Μιτὰ ἀγάπης δίξαι αὐτὸν, μᾶλλον λὶ οἰκ αὐτὸν, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἰμὰ στλάγχνα, οὕτω γὰς αὐτὸν αγαπῶ καὶ ἰντῷ ψυχῷ πιριφίρω. See Suicer's Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus on the word.—Τ.

he LXX frequently renders by sheos, ut for and jun it has oixreigerv. 150, έλεος and έλεεδν (έλεημοσύνη) are put, in the lew Testament, for those benefits which are estowed on the miserable; but οἰκτιρμός, never. he same observation may be made on that ery remarkable passage, Rom. ix. 15, ἐλεήσω αν έλεῶ και οἰκτειρήσω ον αν οἰκτείρω, compared ith Exod. xxxiii. 19. He who is ὁ ἐλεῶν, strives relieve the miserable, and does if he is ole; but he who limits himself to his compason only, he is said, oixreiges. The Latins apear to express both notions by the words misicors and misericordia, unless we are correct in istinguishing miseratio and misericordia, as nat the first agrees with οἰχτιρμός and οἶχτος, the tter with shoot. The passage, therefore, may e thus rendered, "I will succour whom I will succour. I will pity whom I pity." inly according to the mind of the Apostle: r the Hebrew words have rather the sense f certain and perpetual favour and Divine aid, an of absolute will in the distribution of blessgs. But they err greatly who think that they Educe from these words, that God wills not save some. For what follows, aga our ou rou λοντος, οὐδε τοῦ τρέχοντος, ἀλλὰ τοῦ ἐλεοῦντος Βεοῦ, is certainly not the force, that even though ly one desires the favour of God, he cannot attain it, if God has negatived (noluerit) that he should attain it. For, in the case of one who gives a benefit, the accepted benefit must be referred to his benignity, not to our desire; we receive benefits, therefore, from the mercy and clemency of God, not for our own works or deservings. Therefore, it is rightly said, οὐ τοῦ θέλοντος, οὐδε τοῦ τρέχοντος, άλλά τοῦ έλεοῦπος Seoũ, scil. το χάρισμα; that is, the χάρισμα, a conferred benefit; cannot be referred to our effort or merit, but to the mercy of God, for from thence it comes; he favours and benefits whom he will. It does not follow, then, as some would have it, that even he who wishes cannot obtain, because God forbids the success of his prayer; but rather, what is most true, that labour as we may, it is by the grace of God we obtain the promise, and not by our own merit. comes from God; he gives to the unworthy; some rejoice in it, some receive it not. These fail of the promise, because they seek it not in the right way; ισζαήλ διώχων νόμον δικαιοσύνης, είς νόμον δικαιοσύνης οὐκ ἔφθασε, ὅτι οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως, ἀλλ' ἐκ έξ ἔργων νόμου, ver. 31; those οὐα ήλεημένοι, ἀλλ' ἐλιηθέντες, μη διώχοντες δικαιοσύνην, καταλαμβάνουσι δικαοσύνην, δικαιοσύνην δε την έκ πίστεως. Has then God so had mercy (¿λεεῖ) that those whom he willed not to save, ought to perish notwithstanding διώχωσι τήν δικαιοσύνην. Certain it is, they do not btain what they wish, because ζηλον μέν θεοῦ χουσιν, άλλ' οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν. Had they sought he true dinaiooun, they would have obtained it, ret, at the same time, οὐ τοῦ τρέχοντος, ἀλλα τοῦ Asourros, the gift would have been of God. rave often wondered, therefore, that those who reld the notion of an absolute decree, have and recourse to these words for the support of heir opinion. Certainly they have so understood the passage. It matters little, therefore, whether we seek or disregard the favour of God, if God only regard us; for however any one may strive and seek to attain salvation, vet he cannot attain it unless God has willed it. This is assuredly true, if God has negatived it; but this idea is repugnant to right reason and true religion; nor is it in the passage in question.b Certainly it becomes every

b All this is very accurately and judiciously stated. But the author is fighting with a man of straw. Which of the Calvinistic divines asserts, that man seeks to be made holy, and that a holy God has put a negative on his desire? The great body of those divines who are advocates for the sowereignty of God's grace, which man's natural heart impugns, and who wear the epithet, Calvinistic, as an opprobrious brand, go no further than the statement of Titmann; and take the same view which he does, of the passage in question. There have been rash assertions on the subject of a decree of reprobation, but they were ever confined to a few. Leg. p. 217, τολμης ότατοι καὶ αἰθάδεις.) But in this passage τολμηταὶ αἰθάδεις, are not the rash, who seek only to please themselves, but the petulant and cruel, who care for no one; and certainly a bishop should not be αἰθάδης, but mild and σεμνός.

ฉังน่า ประจาก ฉังสองอังกา

So far are similar, that they prefer to live with others in enmity and strife, rather than in friendship and peace. But as the our sign and the onoisi differ, the one being made by those between whom there had been no previous enmity, the other being the covenanted termination of war, at least for a time, so the several adjectives will have a distinct meaning also. The ἀσύνθετοι are not, as is commonly stated, those who break a confederacy, but are rather those who will not come into a confederacy, nor be easily led to adopt pacific measures, unverträglich. The ἄσπονδω are they who will not make peace, but prefer interminable war, unversöhnlich. The activator do nothing to preserve peace; the assessed do nothing to restore peace, αδιάλλακτοι άσπονδις πύλεμος is implacable war. But Demosthenes says aour91τώτατον τον ἔχλον, because they were ἀνομόλογος and ἀσύμφονος as Harpocrates explains the expression.

kingdom of Messiah, ver. 24. Rightly, therefore, is it rendered by Schott, "divine gifts do not depend on him who seeks," &c., for show emós is to have cause in any thing, i. e. to be so conjoined with any thing, as that it is the cause of being or doing any thing. hence, it is to owe one's origin to any one, to depend on any one, to be in the power of any one. Xenoph. Memor. i. 1. 9, τοὺς δὲ πάντα τῆς ανθρωπίνης γνώμης είναι οἰομένους, δαιμονιάν έφη. (Mark xii. 23, τίνος αὐτῶν ἔσται ἡ γυνή.) Whether, therefore, it be rendered, "It is not in the power," or, "it does not depend on," yet it means no more than that the efficient cause is the mercy of God. Lastly, we must be careful not to attach to the particle av, v. 15, the notion of uncertainty as to the will or determination, which there is no reason to suppose, that some persons have done. For the words ον αν έλεω do not signify, quemcunque voluero, whosoever I may wish, as if it were uncertain whether he wished or not; but, si quem volo, he whom I wish. So that the true sense of the passage is, if I have pity on any one, I will have pity on him: and therefore it is not uncertain whether he wills to pity, but it is most certain; for that he had willed to be graciously present with Moses, he had previously promised. So in Xenoph. Polit. ii. 6, ἐἀν ἡ πόλις διδοίη οἰποδομησωμένοις ἐγκεκτῆσθαι, οἴ ἄν ἀιτούμενοι ἄξιοι δοποῦση είναι, i. e. those seeking the privileges of the city, who may appear worthy. Thucyd. vi. 14, δς ἀν for εἴ τις and vi. 16, and ii. 44. Demosth. c. Neaer. 1386, 17.

ψιθυρισταί παταλάλοι.

In Rom. c. i. v. 30, 31. Paul enumerates together, ψιθυριστάς, καταλάλους ὑβριστάς, ὑατρηφάνους, ἀλαζόνας ἀσυνθέτους, ἀσπόνδους ἀστόργους, ἀπλεήμονας. On each of which terms I will speak briefly.

Ψιθυςισταί and κταλάλοι so far agree, that they both mean, a calumniator. They differ however; for the ψιθυςιστής, is he who spreads calumny secretly and whispers it in the ear, απαλάλος is he who slanders openly. So they are distinguished in 2 Cor. xii. 20, on which place Suidas says, ψιθυςισμός ἡ τῶν παςόντων κακλογία, παςὰ τῷ ἀποστόλω. Kuster prefers ἀπόντων. But it makes little difference. The slander

d From Indiatuit, occultavit, and from the same source the Latin susurrus; another instance of the Hebrew hard sound of India being altered in two languages, into an s in the one, and an aspirated t, 9, in the other. N. B.—The same word, with the formative Indiana, is the original of augrapes, mysterium, mystery.—T.

iduces those who are present, sic ro ous, the abnt publicly and adeas. Theodoret says in loc. Βυριστάς λέγει τούς πρός το ούς διαλεγομένους και πατας τινάς πακῶς ἀγορεύοντας and on Romans i. 30. ταλάλοι, οι διαβολαῖς κατά τῶν ἀπόντων ἀδεῶς γρημένοι. The notion of accusation, διαβάλλειν, common to both. But in James iv. 11. αταλαλών άδελφοῦ, καταλαλεῖ νόμου, some think at καταλαλεῖν νόμου means, to act contrary to e law. This is an error, for though we grant at sometimes, though rarely, the same word by be put successively in two different senses; t care must be taken, lest in searching for a eaning in the writings of the Apostles, we ould conclude that this has been done conry to the usage of the word, and that thus introduce uncertainty into the interpretan. Evidently here παταλαλεῖν νόμου is to slan-· the law itself. He who slanders his broer is as if he slandered the law. The Aposadds also, ό τον άδελφον πρίνων, τον νόμιον πρίνει. e law forbids to do either.

άλαζόνες υπερήφανοι (υβρισταί).

αζόνες and υπερήφανοι occur together also in 2 m. iii. 3. They agree so far that both are pressive of one who arrogates to himself re than he ought. But άλαζονεία is more in each, it is ostentation; υπερηφανία is pride not altogether contrary to the truth that James may be teaching here in accordance with the forms and practices of the other Apostles, and with former custom; and partly from the unwillingness to introduce a doubtful interpretation; for the passage, even in their own way, is of no avail to the Romanists. James advises the application of anointing, together with prayer, for the healing of the sick; they never administer extreme unction but when no hope of recovery remains; and they never apply it with the view to recovery, but merely as a means of smoothing the path to heaven for the dying, as appears in the Catechismus Romanus.

f The Catechism of the Council of Trent, used by the authority of Pope Pius V. It has been recently translated into English by Professor Donovan of Maynooth, and the Latin copies are exceedingly scarce. A Protestant controversialist, however, must never confide in the English version without comparing it with the Latin, as Mr. Donovan's text is in many instances softened, according to the present policy of the Romanists, to meet the spirit of these times. The Latin only has the authority of the church; and Mr. Donovan's version will at any convenient season be thrown overboard. The whole tenor, however, of the teaching of the Roman Catechism, is completely at variance with the passage of James on which they profess to found their superstitious ceremony. Practically, their superstitious ceremony has no application whatever to the recovery of the sick. It is only regarded as a preliminary to death. It is called in the Catechism "the sucrament of dying of things that are false, but supergrised to boast conceitedly of things in themselves true.

The isserval differ from both the former. These are the insolent, who, from pride, not only treat others with contempt, but with conturnely and injury. The useras cares for no man, but thinks himself at liberty to act towards any one as he pleases; who put forth their pride in injurious actions. Vid. Eustath. ad Odyss. a, p. 51. and Wettsten. ad N. T. ii. p. 28. The three words, therefore, differ in degree. In ala ζονία there is no contempt, but only silly ostentation. In ὑπερηφανία there is contempt of others and contumely. In Eges there is contempt with injury. Xenophon contrasts σώφρονες with ὑβρισταί. Cyrop. iii. 1. 12. Ages. 10. 2, and the ὑπερηφάνω are contrasted with received in James iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 5.

To these words we may add a fourth, αὐθάδης, which occurs in Titus i. 7; 2 Pet. ii. 10. It signifies that viciousness of life which arises out of a self-satisfaction, that can approve of nothing but the doings of self. It designates him who does not accommodate himself to others; and is consequently unaccommodating and morose. Aristotle calls him δύσχολος. It is therefore often united with σχληςός and 9ςασύς; as in Pet. ii. 10, with τολμητής. (Eunap. de Leg. p. 217, τολμης ότατοι και αὐθάδως.) But in this passage τολμηται αὐθάδως, are not the rash, who seek only to please themselves, but the petulant and cruel, who care for no one; and certainly a bishop should not be αὐθάδης, but mild and σεμνός.

aci Beror acrovdor

So far are similar, that they prefer to live with others in enmity and strife, rather than in friendship and peace. But as the συνθήπη and the onoion differ, the one being made by those between whom there had been no previous enmity, the other being the covenanted termination of war, at least for a time, so the several adjectives will have a distinct meaning also. The ἀσύνθετοι are not, as is commonly stated, those who break a confederacy, but are rather those who will not come into a confederacy, nor be easily led to adopt pacific measures, unverträglich. The aomordo are they who will not make peace, but prefer interminable war, unversöhnlich. The downers do nothing to preserve peace; the asmordor do nothing to restore peace, αδιάλλακτοι ασπονδις πύλεμος is implacable war. But Demosthenes says advideτώτατον τὸν ἔχλον, because they were ἀνομόλογος and ἀσύμφονος as Harpocrates explains the expression.

The difference between acrogyor aredinaries, may be readily traced from what has been already said on the word sheep.

(ἀμαθεῖς) ἀστήρικτοι· ἀσθενεῖς· ἄἰξὸωστοι.

The two former words occur together in 2 Pet. iii. 16, α οι άμαθεῖς και άστήρικτοι στρεβλούσιν siς την ιδίαν αὐτῶν ἀπώλειαν. We may admit at once, that, if used in their proper sense, they are not synonymous. But as, in this passage, the aorheixfor may be those who are not yet sufficiently established in religious knowledge, they may properly be compared with the aμαθεῖς. The aμαθεῖς are those who have not learned that which they might and ought to have learned, who have not had proper instruction and discipline. Xenoph. Mem. iv. 1. 4, παιδευθέντας και μαθόντας — απαιδεύτους και άμαθείς. They are therefore the untutored; but the αστήχιατοι are they who have learned, but have not been adequately taught and confirmed, who yet need definite religious knowledge. It were scarcely necessary to notice this, but that interpreters have endeavoured to attach to the word ἀμαθης, the idea of perversity and impiety, with the view probably to justify the further affirmation of Peter, that they pervert the difficult passages of Paul's writings to their destruction. But what then should we say of the ἀστὰροιτο, unless we suppose that these also bear the blame of their own infirmity? For the ἀπάλεια is not the penalty of crime, but the evil which arises spontaneously from ignorance, although that ignorance be blameless. They render ἀμαθης, indocile; but they could not easily justify this rendering, unwilling to be taught. The case is different, if it is said αμαθης, s. ἀμαθύστερος πρός τι. But there is no need of this. For they who are so untaught and unstable, do pervert the δυσύητα of Paul to their own hurt. They ought already to be sopol καὶ τίλεια.

But in 1 Corinth. xi. 30, & Surie, and appears, are used together; and they are rendered by Luther, Schwache und Kranke. If we give heed to the old grammarians, appears and recourse differ; and, on the contrary, & Surie and appear to be identical in meaning, if we consider their composition. Yet they differ; for they are & Surie who have not strength, infirm, imbecile; they are appears to the strength of whose powers has failed, languid, sick. Cicero de clar. or. 180. infirma atque etiam aegra valetudine fuit. So in Xenoph. Apol. 30, appears the fuit. So in Xenoph. Apol. 30, appears the strength of whose so in Xenoph. Apol. 30, appears the strength of the suries of the strength of the strength of the suries of the strength o

Le Deveráran Ingian Biar memobusyos. He is activas who has naturally no strength. He is actionres who has lost his strength by disease. Xenoph. Memor, ii, 6. 12, ei our achenoraru ru cumari Id. Occoron. 4. 2, run suparan Indusques nal al Juna diffustrorigas ylynorras. Although it must be at the same time admitted that both are predicated of the sick, both in the New Testament and other writings. Many suppose that the notion of sickness is intended by the word κάμνων in James v. 15, καλ ή εὐχή τῆς πίστιως iγερεί του κάμενοντα; especially because the word ம்கிஸ் occurs in verse 14. And, therefore. the papists bring forward this passage to prove the sacrament of extreme unction. Ithough we should concede that xáprur may nean to be sick, (vid. Wetsten, ad N. T. ii. o. 680,) yet it may be doubted whether, in his instance, it does not mean distress of nind. Such is evidently its meaning in Heb. xii. 3, Iva μα χάμητε ταῖς ψυχαῖς ὑμῶν, and Apocal. ii. 7. πεποπίακς άλλ' οὐ πέκμηκας. For κάμνειν properly is to be labouring or distressed with any thing; κάμνων is he whose strength gives way in consequence of excessive labour; whence κάμοντες and κεκμηκότες (but not κάμνοντες) are the dead, whose labours are ended. I do not press this conjecture, however, partly because it is

CHAPTER VI.

A WANT of minute attention to the force of synonymous terms is not only a great impediment to those who are seriously engaged in the interpretation of the New Testament; but also in a point of still greater magnitude gives rise to many doubts, which, although they may wear to the unlearned the semblance of importance, will yet be smiled at by men of philological attainment, who, as possessed of extensive erudition, well aware of the usage of words, and wont to proceed themselves with the greatest caution, consider that theologians, in interpreting Greek writings, often confound rashly all words and forms, and conceive that our lexicons are sadly wanting in sound principles. For some persons, when they find words, or forms of speech, in any book of the New Testament, which are rarely or never met with in the others, make use of them as a test in a still higher matter, and deny that the books in which such words are found can be written by the same author as those are in mossible to give a good reason why hipun, is d in some places and wast in others. For when ner word is added to other words, as iden sire, yyu Cor Liyerre, &c. it may be observed that rur is generally used, if in the word to which is added, the notion of speaking already exs; but that if this is to be given as an adtional notion, then shows is used, Luke xxi. 8. sanzwansan depontes. (xxii. 64.) v. 12. sdeń9n ντον λέγων. ν. 21. ήςξαντο διαλογίζεοθαι λέγοντες. ν. D. ἐγέγγυζον λέγοντες. Contra. Luke xxii. 17, Eάμενος είπε. v. 13. η ψατω είπων. v. 20. idas είπε. and if it is found to be otherwise in some insances, it must be remembered that the sacred riters did not in all places observe the rules f elegant composition. Yet frequently when by appears to have been put for sime it has ot the meaning of speaking, but of thinking, eeling, commanding. So Mark. v. 28, 11 Jaro οῦ iματίου αὐτοῦ· ἔλεγε γάς. with the parallel passage n Matth. ix. 21, Exeys yae er saurn. Matth. ix. 23, 24, έλθων - ίδων - ελεγεν αὐτοῖς αναχωρεῖτε. There appears to be an opposition to this rule in the frequent form, & money Seis - sine. But that aroxeinsoan is rather to be referred to the mind than to the words, is evident from the assages i t occurs, where no interro-

from hahm, which simply implies the use of the human voice and of words. And often they are so made use of by the most elegant writers that they scarcely appear to differ. Yet they differ in the same degree as our reden and sagen. For Neyson has reference to the sentiment and the connexion of words: sinsh relates only to the words which any one has successively spoken. This difference may be learned from those passages in which the two words occur in juxtaposition. Xenoph. Oecon. iv. 23, zal & Augardeog. . signific of Layeig, φάναι. Cyrop. i. 4. 12, οι παίδες είπεν πονηχέν λέγεις τὸ πεᾶγμα. Cyrop. v. l. 10, κάλλιστα, ἔρη, λλγεις: ···· τότε μεν δή ταῦτ' εἰπίντες διελύθησαν. Cyrop. vi. 4. 19, εί μεν τις είπεῖν τι βούλεται, λεξάτω. cian. Hermot. 8. i. p. 747. Μηδαμῶς, ἀλλ' εἰπὶ 6, τι και λέγεις. For in λέγειν the notion inheres of collecting (colligendi) words in a sentence or oration, whence, λόγος, λογισμός, &c. διαλεγέσθαι; but in sires the words only are considered which any one utters successively. Hence we may say, είπεῖν λόγον, and λόγος of the oration itself; but never λέγει λόγον, or έῆμα. same way léges and sime are used in the New Testament, Luke xxi. 3, ελπεν άληθῶς λέγω. xxi. 5, τινών λεγόντων περί τοῦ ίεροῦ - εἶπε. xxii. 34, ὁ δὲ · εἶπε· λέγω σω, and elsewhere; and I suspect that it is possible to give a good reason why hipm, is used in some places and with in others. For when either word is added to other words, as iden wars έγόγγυζου λέγουτες, &c. it may be observed that Néven is generally used, if in the word to which it is added, the notion of speaking already exists; but that if this is to be given as an additional notion, then show is used, Luke xxi. 7. 8. έπηςώτησαν λέγοντες. (xxii. 64.) v. 12. έδιήθη αὐτὸν λέγων. ν. 21. ἥεξαντο διαλογίζεσθαι λέγοντες. ν. 30. eyéyyu (or léyerres. Contra. Luke xxii. 17. Beξάμενος siπε. v. 13. η ψατω είπων. v. 20. idών siπε. And if it is found to be otherwise in some instances, it must be remembered that the sacred writers did not in all places observe the rules of elegant composition. Yet frequently when Adyus appears to have been put for simus it has not the meaning of speaking, but of thinking, feeling, commanding. So Mark. v. 28, 1 Jan τοῦ iματίου αὐτοῦ· ἔλεγε γάς. with the parallel passage in Matth. ix. 21, garys yae er saurff. Matth. ix. 23, 24, ἐλθών — ἰδών — ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς ἀναχωρεῖτε. There appears to be an opposition to this rule in the frequent form, anoxyideic - sine. But that advencines and is rather to be referred to the mind than to the actual words, is evident from the passages in which it occurs, where no interrogation precedes, which is often the case in the New Testament. So Luke xxii. 50, 51. And in Luke v. 31, our Lord answered the Pharisees not in his own name, but in the name, i. e. on the behalf of his Apostles.

The word igain only remains to be noticed. But this appears so far to differ from both sire? and \(\lambda \equiv \), that it should neither be considered as relating to the words only of the speaker, nor to the speech only, but to the mind and will of the speaker. It has almost always the notion of denouncing, affirming, objecting, or commanding; or some other thing which involves the mind and will of the speaker. It is, in fact, to enunciate or give forth the thought. Examples occur in the Lexicons to the New Testament. But let students be careful not to admit the idea that egesiv means sometimes, to interrogate. It may be used of him who utters his own mind, while he seeks to know the mind of another, as in the passages usually adduced, but simply and properly (per se) it cannot mean, to interrogate. In the same way as héreir may be, to deny, because it often occurs that & \(\delta \equiv \), denies, or as sime may be to reproach, if it is followed by reproaches. In fine, λαλεῖ is to speak or talk, i. e. to use s possible to give a good reason why him, is used in some places and wask in others. For when either word is added to other words, as iden sine. hypyrugor layorre, &c. it may be observed that Véyen is generally used, if in the word to which it is added, the notion of speaking already exists; but that if this is to be given as an additional notion, then simil is used. Luke xxi. 7, 8. ἐπηρώτησαν λέγοντες. (xxii. 64.) v. 12. ἐδεήθη κύτον λέγων. τ. 21. ήςξαντο διαλογίζεσθαι λέγοντες. τ. 30. έγέγγυζου λέγουτες. Contra. Luke xxii. 17, Beξάμενος είπε. v. 13. ή ψατω είπων. v. 20. idών είπε. And if it is found to be otherwise in some instances, it must be remembered that the sacred writers did not in all places observe the rules of elegant composition. Yet frequently when Adyen appears to have been put for simil it has not the meaning of speaking, but of thinking, feeling, commanding. So Mark. v. 28, "Jaro τοῦ ἰματίου αὐτοῦ· ἔλεγε γάς. with the parallel passage in Matth. ix. 21, Theye yae er saury. Matth. ix. 23, 24, ἐλθών — ἰδών — ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς ἀναχωρεῖτε. There appears to be an opposition to this rule in the frequent form, among Seig - sime. But that danginosa is rather to be referred to the mind than to the actual words, is evident from the passages in which it occurs, where no interrogation precedes, which is often the case in the New Testament. So Luke xxii. 50, 51. And in Luke v. 31, our Lord answered the Pharisees not in his own name, but in the name, i. e. on the behalf of his Apostles.

The word igain only remains to be noticed. But this appears so far to differ from both simil and heyers, that it should neither be considered as relating to the words only of the speaker, nor to the speech only, but to the mind and will of the speaker. It has almost always the notion of denouncing, affirming, objecting, or commanding; or some other thing which involves the mind and will of the speaker. It is, in fact, to enunciate or give forth the thought. Examples occur in the Lexicons to the New Testament. But let students be careful not to admit the idea that igsiv means sometimes, to interrogate. It may be used of him who utters his own mind, while he seeks to know the mind of another, as in the passages usually adduced, but simply and properly (per se) it cannot mean, to interrogate. In the same way as léven may be, to deny, because it often occurs that & léyou, denies, or as simei may be to reproach, if it is followed by reproaches. In fine, λαλεῖν is to speak or talk, i. e. to use may be shown readily, that later writers have made the same distinction. A few examples will suffice. Lucian. Icaromen. ii. p. 776. Luna, says: πάν τινα ίδω αὐτῶν μοιχεύοντα ἢ κλέπτοντα ἢ άλλο τι τολμεώντα νυκτερινώτατον, εύθύς έπισπασαμένη το νέφος, ἐνεχαλυ-ψάμην. Here if νέφος meant a cloud, he could not have written 50 vspos: it must have been without the article, that it might be indicated that the moon involved herself in some cloud. All will feel that he could not have written ή πφέλη. Nor, elsewhere, is the article added to this word in the singular, unless a certain particular cloud is intended, as 1 Cor. x. 1, 2. But rd ripos may be put absolutely, because it denotes an indefinite and indistinct mass. that delightful passage, therefore, of Euripides, (Phoen. v. 166.) which Schiller had probably in his mind, 'Ανεμώχεος είθε δρόμον νεφέλας ποσλ έξανύσωμι δι' αίθερος πρός εμόν όμογενέτορα, the article is wanting. But there is no need νέρος μαρτύρων ἐπισπώμεθα; let us return from this digression.

The Apostle could not write νερέλην μαρτύρων, he ought to say νέρος. For the Greeks, when they would express a great assembled multitude, which can scarcely be numbered, always write νέρος, never νεφέλη. Homer. Iliad. δ, 274. ψ, 133, νέρος πεζῶν. Iliad. ξ, 243, νέφος πολέμου. ib. v. 755. ψάρων νέρος ἢε κολοιῶν; also νέφος δρεών

Aristoph. Avib. v. 296, repos argoudar ib. v. 579. and many other instances. But in this sense never, as far as I know, is κεφέλη found; neither is it ever used in the New Testament for a multitude. Therefore, since the Apostle could not use another word, it is vain to adduce this passage in proof of a difference of style. if we should concede, that he might have written πληθος μαρτύρων, yet the word νέφος which he has used, in this sense cannot be compared with νεφελη; neither is it necessary to suppose that this form is borrowed from the LXX, when it occurs among all writers, and that most frequently rare words and elegant forms of speech are found in those writers whose style is the least artificial; which forms, if they are found in any other writer whom he might have had before him, would still not give ground to suspect imitation; or to conjecture a common national origin of both writers; unless it were manifest also, that such words and forms were entertained by both, in some peculiar sense unknown to writers in general. Therefore, also, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, we must, in the first place, inquire, whether those forms of speech which, in the other books of the New Testament, are never or rarely found, and certainly not in the Epistles of Paul, are used in a peculiar sense and manner foreign to other writers, which only occurs in cases where the quotation is made from the Septuagint.

But it bears still more closely on this point, that some think they have observed certain words, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, for which Paul, in a similar case, would have used different words; although, if we accurately examine the whole matter, it will appear that they are synonyms of the very same thing, but, which is of the nature and essence of synonyms, presented under a different aspect and mode of thought.

διατάσσειν διαστέλλεσθαι.

Both these words occur often in the New Testament. Paul uses them in Galat. iii. 9, in speaking of the law, διαταγείς δι' ἀγγέλων. Of this solemn interdict, Exod. xix. 12, 13, he thus speaks in the Epistle to the Hebrews, xii. 20, οὐα ἔφεξον τὸ διαστελλόμενον. Some therefore say διατάσσειν has the same meaning as διαστέλλεσθαι, but that Paul never uses the latter word; for that, in a similar case, he writes διαταγείς, and that, therefore, had Paul been the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews he would have written in this instance as in others, τὸ διαταγέν. All, however, will surely see it rash to assume that διατάσσειν and διαστέλλεσθαι have the same meaning; and that if Paul had been speaking of this particular interdict he would have said τὸ διαταιχέν, because elsewhere he had written ὁ κόμος διαταιχές. But, before we show how these words differ, let us inquire of these persons whether they think Paul could have written ὁ κόμος διαστελλόμενος. Surely they will agree that he could not. For though the two words agree in this, that each word has the force of, disposing, yet they differ, inasmuch as they signify a different mode of the same power.

Διατάσσιν is so to dispose matters that each is in its own place, or to put in order, to arrange; διαστέλλεσθαι properly is so to separate, that nothing should be in a wrong place or mode. Hence diarásous is used for any ordinance or prescribed arrangement; διαστέλλισθα frequently denotes separation, interdict. durτάσσειν is to dispose, to constitute; διαστέλλει to arrange in different parts, and, in the middle voice. διαστέλλισθαι to interdict. Nor is it casually used in this sense in the middle voice. See Matth. xvi. 20, διεστείλατο τοῖς μαθηταῖς ικα underl είπωσιν. Mark v. 43. (Luke viii. 56, παςήγγειλε μηδενί εἰπεῖν); vii. 36; ix. 9. In these passages there is the notion of warning against an act, i. e. interdicting. (One passage occurs, Acts xv. 24, where it appears to denote a mandate simply, as in Diodorus Siculus, xi. 38.) Hence, therefore, το διαστελλόμενον, in this place, is an interdict; which was the fact. But a very different meaning exists in the passage & whose diarayel; di ayyidor viz. that the law is constituted and disposed by the ministry of angels. This is evident, if we look at the origin of the words. rággen is properly to place in a certain juxtaposition or series; στέλλων is, not to send, according to the lexicons, but, to put in a place, or to deposit in a place, whence arise the notions of preparing, arranging, &c. It is not similar to the German stellen. Hence στίλλισθαι από τινος is to avoid a thing, as it were, to put oneself in another place, as 2 Thess. iii. 6. στέλλεσθαι ύμας άπο παντός άδελφοῦ άτάκτως περιπα-The glossaries give it correctly in loc. στέλλεσθαι, αφίστασθαι, αναχωρείν. See also 2 Cor. viii. 20, στελλόμενοι τοῦτο, μή τις ὑμᾶς μωμήσεται. Erasmus is correct as to the sense, when he says that the 'idea is taken from the fact of sailors avoiding a rock; but it is, at the same time, an error in the scholiasts to say, that சால்ல்க்கிய properly relates to a voyage or a naval expedition. In the same way, Polybius 8248, viii. 17, où durapérar nastôlou sit sis sis com-Bilas καταξίωση στίλλισθαι, i. e. to remove or reject. Therefore, as amoreham is to send away. to dismiss, ἀναστέλλειν to repress or put down, xaractidass to suppress, outtidass to contract or to arrange or confine in one place, so downshim is to allocate in different parts or places, to separate; and therefore diagrahledas is spoken of an interdict, because he who interdicts from any thing is considered to do the same thing as if he actually separated him whom he interdicted, from that which he has interdicted. And this explains the use of the middle voice: for it often occurs that middle verbs, while the proper relative notion is preserved, are at the same time referred to an object. In this passage, therefore, το διαστέλλομενον means an interdict: neither could the author of the Epistle, be he whom he may, have written diarerayment.

^{*} See a valuable paragraph on the word discrept, in Euicer's Ecclesiastical Thesaurus, a work of almost indispensable importance to theological students. It is a mine of erudite and apt quotation, from which many have drawn the means of their pretensions to learning, without having the candour to admit their obligation to the lord of the soil.—

I will add another instance which is wont to be adduced from the Epistle to the Hebrews.

άμετάθετος. ἀπαςάβατος βεβαιος. They say that in Hebrews vi. 17, 18, άμετάθετες 8 used, and in vii. 24, ἀπαράβατος, when in other books of the New Testament, and by Paul himself, β β β αιος would have been. But though sound philologists would smile at such a statement, let them bear with us while we touch this briefly. 'Απαράβατος does not mean, as some say, immutable; (for παςαβαίνων is incorrectly rendered to change,) but, that which does not pass away, or migrate; austaberos, is that which is not changed; βιβαιος that which remains in its place. It is true that there is in these words the common idea of firmness and constancy, as in ἀχίνητος, ἀμετάχίνητος, έδραΐος; but he would err who should say that they so signified the same thing that he who meant that which was αμιτάθετος or απαράβατος, could say also that it was βεβαιος. Certainly to express the notion which the Apostle had conceived in the former passage, vi. 17, 18, he ought to have written το άμετάθετον τῆς βουλῆς αὐτοῦ. For equerastros is constant and immutable, for it is frequently said of those things which consist and change not, but remain ever the same. But βεβαιος is firm, immoveable, certain, fixed. If, therefore, he had written το βεβαιον της βουλης he would only have affirmed that the will o God is certain and fixed; but when he wishe to affirm that it is immutable, that which ever the same, and changes not with other things, then he uses auera Seror, as Diod. Sicul. xiii. 83, reads vomous ameragerous. xvi. 69, αμετάθετον διαφοραν. i. 23, Ισχυραν πίστιν καί άμετάθετον; and other authors. On the contrary, when he wishes to say no more than firm, certain, fixed, then Paul writes \(\beta \cop \beta \alpha \text{os, as vi. 19,} \) άγχὺξαν τῆς ψυχῆς ἀσφαλῆ τε καὶ βεβαίαν. σαββησία βεβαία. ix. 17, διαθήκη έπλ νεκροίς βεβαία, &c. Nor in the other passage, vii. 24, would he have written βεβαία iερωσύνη, but he ought to have written ἀπαράβατος. He wished to say that the priesthood of Christ did not pass from one to another priest, for that Christ was a priest for ever, sis row aiwa, and this notion was expressed by the word ἀπαςάβατος. He might have said ἀδιάδοχος; but if he had written βεβαία, he would have been very wide of what he intended; nay, he would have spoken foolishly, for the Levitical priesthood itself was Bisaus but not ἀπαράβατος, for that may be the one which is not the other, as a kingdom may be βεβαίος although it passes successively into other hands, διά το θανάτω χωλύεσθαι αυτούς παραμένειν. Lastly. it is no ground for surprise that these words occur only in the Epistle to the Hebrews; for the same things are not treated of in all the Epistles. Neither has Paul demonstrated in his other epistles that the priesthood of Christ is perpetual, and not to pass to others. Otherwise it appears absolutely certain to us, that he would have used the word ἀπαράβατος. Occumenius, in loc. rightly adds, ἀδιαδοχον, ἀπίλευτον, for that which in the same respect remains now, is in that respect, without end, ἀπίλευτος.

Several examples of synonyms might be adduced from the Epistle to the Hebrews, which by many persons would be accounted expressions of precisely equal force, and from which they would conclude rashly that the author had used peculiar terms in communicating the same idea, as v. c. siç rò diquexès, siç roùs alavas. άθετησις, παλαιότης άντίτυπον, σχιά μέτοχον είναι, δέξασ-Βαι δλιγωρείν, καταφρονείν νόθος, έκ πορνείας γεννηθείς. Βραχύ τι, πρὸς ώραν; and many others which are brought forward as a cumulative proof that in this Epistle the same ideas are very differently expressed from what they are in other books of the New Testament, and that therefore it is not probable that Paul was its author. One example may suffice, which properly does not belong to our subject, but yet is not very foreign to that subtilty of distinction which the discussion of synonyms requires. There are constructions of the same words, with different cases, whence it results that although the same thing is intended, yet the mode of thought in which it is presented is different. Among these we may notice, nearen tivos and nearen ti.

These expressions are considered to mean the same thing; and even the Lexicons do not notice the difference of the force of the two constructions. Seeing, therefore, that in the Epistle to the Hebrews, xearen is only found twice with the genitive, but in the other Pauline Epistles always with an accusative, it is affirmed that this is idiomatic and peculiar to this epistle; and that Paul in those passages would have written zearen with an accusative. They should, however, have inquired first, whether rearrive really has the same meaning with either case; and if not, then it is false that κρατεῖν τινός is idiomatic in this epistle. is true, that in this epistle the word is not found with an accusative: (It occurs but twice altogether, c. iv. 14, and vi. 18,) but the reason is, that the Apostle has only used the word where he wished to express that, which, to be understood by his readers, he must have written zearsiv with a genitive construction.

Generally speaking, with respect to words, which may be construed with an accusative or a genitive case, this rule appears to obtain;

that if they occur with an accusative, the relation is between them and the whole thing in question; if with a genitive, the relation is only to a part. So far, therefore, a difference appears between xearin rives and xearin ri that zearis rivés signifies only to take hold of a thing. or to possess it; but xearen or to have and to hold in his power. For although, xearyous rives is often said of one who has possessed a certain thing, and has it now under his power;h yet I doubt whether passages occur in which xearsh 71 is put simply for to take, to possess, as xears rwis occurs repeatedly (Luke viii. 54. Mark i. 31; v. 41; ix. 27. Matth. ix. 25,) except when the additional notion exists also of a certain force by which any one desires to seize a reluctant person, and bring him under control. So Matth. xiv. 3, κρατήσας του Ιωάννην, h Fischer, in his Prolusions on the Faults of the existing Lexicons for the New Testament, p. 474. in remarking on the force of the word ὑπωπιάζω in 1 Cor. ix. 27, that it has the same power as ὑπωπιάζω in 1 cor. ix. 27, that it has the same power as ὑπωπιάζω in 1 cor. ix. 27, that it has the same way as love (Chariton vi. 3.) is said κρωπιῦν τῶν Sιῶν, that is, to rule over them. For κρωπιῦν differs from κκῶν in this respect, that κκῶν means simply to conquer; but κρωπιῦν so to conquer that the conquered party is subjected to, and in the power of the conqueror. Plato Orat. 12. Ken. Cyrop. vi. 1, 21."—T.

idysev. xviii. 28, nearhsas abrit expre. xxii. 6. κρατήσαντες τους δούλους υβρισαν xxvi. 4, δια τον 'Inσοῦν πρατήσωσι δόλφ καλ αποκτείνωσιν, in which instances the accusative must be rendered in connexion with both verbs, as in Matth xii. 11, xearhou aurd xal iveei. And that this distinction obtains among other Greek writers, may be shown by examples. So in Sophocles Oed. Col. v. 1380. τοι γάς τὸ σὸν θάπημα καὶ τοὺς σούς θεόνους κεατούσιν, i. e. they hold; but immediately afterwards in v. 1385, we find where The iμφυλίου δοεί κεατήσαι, to bring into subjection. So in Aristophanes Avib. v. 419. zearen ar n riv έχθεδν, η φίλοισιν ώφελεῖν έχειν. The Scholiast says, σημειωτέον, ότι τὸ κρατεῖν συνέταξεν αἰτιατική. this is made out by the text itself. By which thou mayest control thine enemy, or benefit thy friends. For that the idea is, not that of conquering an enemy or reducing him to subjection, but rather that of having control over him, is made evident by the disjunctive conjunction; for the opposition is not to the idea of procuring friends, but to that of doing them good. In the same way, it occurs in Xenophon. de Exped. Cyri. v. 6. 3, πέρατα τοῦ ὄρους ὑψηλὰ, ἀ πρατεῖν πατέχοντες καὶ πάνυ ολίγοι δύναιντ' αν. In which the notion evidently is, not that of occupying, but of holding, obtaining, in opposition to the enemy. Nor is this contradicted by a passage in Hist. Graeca vii. 3. 4. where the words, "you oux an durausros, τῶν Θηβαίων ἐχόντων τὴν ἀκρόπολιν, τῆς πόλεως κρατεῖν, are rendered "since he knew that he could not retain the city in his power;" according to a previous assertion, τοῦ μὲν ἄστεως ἐκράτει. doubt, however, whether πόλις and ἄστυ have the same meaning here. It is contrary to the elegant accuracy of Xenophon, that these two words should stand in juxtaposition in the same passage to express a similar idea. Doubtless rease, in this passage, as is frequently the case in this author, means "the state." Euphron, therefore, understood, that although he occupied the city, he could not command the whole state, while the prefect Thebanus held the citadel, and he wished therefore to persuade the Thebans that they should eject the leading men who were with him in the tower, and then give up the state to him, (παςαδοῦναι την The word occurs in a similar way in Thucyd. vi. 11, καὶ τοὺς μὲν, κατεργασάμενοι, κἂν

i Phavorinus, says πόλις, καὶ ὁ τόπος, καὶ οἱ κατοικοῦντις. both the place and its inhabitants; and the Lexicon Xenophonteum gives a number of instances, in which Xenophon has used the word expressly in the sense of civitas, or the state.— T.

κατάσχοιμεν, τῶν δ' εἰ καὶ κρατήσωμεν, διὰ πολλοῦ · γε καὶ πολλῶν ὄντων, χαλεπῶς ἀν ἄρχεν δυναίμεθα; and at the end of the chapter, χεν δὲ μι πρὸς τὰς τύχας τῶν ἐναντίων ἐπαίρεσθαι, ἀλλὰ τὰς διανοίας κρατήσοντας θαξξεῖν.

From these instances, it is evident that, in both places in the Epistle to the Hebrews. κρατησαι should be written with a genitive, for in both cases it denotes, to take, not to hold. For in c. vi. 18, it is said that God interposed a certain evidence of his unchangeable will, "that they might have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope," &c. κεατήσαι της έλπίδος. The καταφυγώντες are the wretched who grasp at this hope, as suppliants do the altar. (Eurip. Iphig. in Aul. v. 911.) Neither should int row 9560, be supplied after xarapuyonres, for they have fled to the hope itself, of which they had not yet become possessed. Nor must the word be compared with a moony in 2 Pet. ii. 20; but παταφυγόντες must be strictly connected with κρατήσαι as an infinitive is often joined with a verb, signifying motion or desire, Matth. xi. 7, 8, 9. Kearnous therefore, in this place, means not to retain, but to apprehend, to take hold. as in Acts xxvii. 13, δόξαντες της προθέσεως xeκεατηκέναι "supposing that they had obtained their purpose." In the other passage the force of zearsh is precisely the same, c. iv. 14, 220σες οὖν ἀρχιερέα μέγαν — πρατῶμεν τῆς ὁμολογίας. For φιολογία here does not denote the religion which we profess, but the paction or covenant, that which is agreed on. For in c. iii. 1, Jesus is mid to be ἀπόστολος και ἀρχιερεύς τῆς ὁμολογίας, i. e. μεσίτης της διαθήχης, not because he is the teacher of religion, but because, as a priest, he provides that we should obtain το ὁμολογούμενον, that is, the grace of God and salvation, concerning which the Apostle is treating. Hence, therefore, κεατησαι της ομολογίας is not to be steadfast in the confession of our faith, according to the popular interpretation, but rather to act with all earnestness, so that we may obtain those blessings, of which our High Priest is the procurer, i. e. κρατήσαι της προκειμένης έλπίδος.

But if this criticism shall appear to some to have in it more of subtilty than truth, this, at least, I trust that equitable judges will concede to me, that when they exercise their own ingenuity in some deeper and more difficult crisis, they will permit to me, in turn, in the explication of words, the same degree of license which they claim for themselves.

CHAPTER VII.

THE right knowledge of particles, in which the Greek language abounds, is attended with much difficulty; but especially in those which, as they serve almost as a common, or at least very closely allied, mark of the relation which they express, are properly accounted syno-For although the degree in which they differ is often so subtle, that it seems to he not always preserved by men who write with less of accuracy and elegance, yet it must never be neglected, if we would strictly investigate the meaning of the sacred writers. And though we know well the great need of caution, lest we rashly judge the style of these men by the strict rules of elegant writing, or attempt to emend their composition by rigid grammatical rules; yet such is the force of custom in the use of words, that even unlearned men are compelled to obey it; and therefore it will always be worth while to consider accurately, the peculiar and distinct force of each separate particle which they use. As an example we will refer to

aver and xwgis

which appear to differ so little, that it scarcely matters which is used in a sentence, when the idea to be expressed is the separation or absence of one thing from another. For undoubtedly they agree in this, that they both indicate that relation in which the object is regarded as separate or absent from the subject. As if I command any one to do something aven γογγυσμών, 1 Pet. iv. 9. I wish all murmurings to be absent; or when it is said of our Lord that he spoke οὐ χωείς παραβολής Matt. xiii. 24; in the same way almost it would be thought, that he did not speak without a parable, and consequently there may be those who would think, that in this passage it might have been written οὐπ ἐλάλει ἄνευ παραβολής. But there is this difference between the two particles, that weis is referred to the subject as separated from the object; avec is referred to the object which is regarded as absent from the subject. When, therefore, I say a thing is done arev TIVOS, I mean, that is done when this is not present; but when I mean, that that which was done was not present with a certain thing, then I must say it was done xweis rivos. It is therefore rightly said in Matth. x. 29, Ev if auran où πεσεδται έπο την γην άνευ τοῦ πατεδς ὑμῶν, that is, not even a sparrow dies, so that the Father is not present, i. e. unconscious or unwilling. (See Ducker, ad Thucyd. iv. 78.) But if xweis had been put instead of arev, it would only have affirmed that no swallow is absent from the Father, when it falls to the ground. In the same way we find ανευ λόγου 1 Pet. iii. 1, but χωρίς ημών 1 Cor. iv. 8; Heb. xi. 40, and xwels xiorews Heb. xi. 6; vii. 7. 20. For ανου πίστεως would be, without faith aiding and assisting; but what he wished to say was, if any one was actually destitute of faith. And xwels num is not when we are not present with you, but when ye are actually separated from us. And if in Heb. the false assertion would have been made. "that these men might not without us, i. e. without our aid and volition, be blessed." But what was wished to be said was, that they should not be blessed otherwise than we, but even as we, through faith and piety, in the midst of calamities. The particle therefore must be xweis, separately, apart from.

The reason is quite evident also in John xv. 5, χωρίς ἐμοῦ οὐ δύνασθε ποιεῖν οὐδέν, i. e. separate from me, ἐὰν μὴ μείνητε ἐν ἐμοῦ, v. 4, 6, (conf. John i. 3.) So Ephes. ii. 12, ἦτε χωρίς Χριστοῦ, i. e. ye were far from Christ, as the context shews, άπηλλοτριωμένοι της πολιτείας τοῦ Ίσραήλ. ἄνευ Χριστοῦ in, would be only, Christ was not present with you. And hence, therefore, οὐα ἐλάλει χωρὶς παgaβολής could not be changed into ανευ παςαβολής, for this would refer it to the word παραβολης, when in fact xwees applies more directly to the speaker; and ἄνευ παραβολης λαλείν, if indeed it could be said at all, would signify that he spoke without a parable being present. Nor is this opposed by Rom. x. 14, χωςὶς κηςύσσοντος. though it might have been ανευ κηςύσσοντος, yet the whole formula required that which is written; πῶς δὲ ἀχούσουσι χωείς χηεύσσοντος, i. e. separated from him who teaches; for this appears to be the mind of the Apostle, rather than, if no teacher be present, as he is frequently interpreted. But axober aven angloscorres would be-to hear alone, without a teacher.

Besides, unless I am altogether mistaken, an abundant proof of this distinction lies in the fact, that $\chi_{\omega \ell' i}$ is not only used with a genitive, but by itself, absolutely, as an adverb; whilst driv invariably has as its adjunct the genitive of the thing assumed to be absent. For since $\chi_{\omega \ell' i}$ is referred to the subject, and driv to the object, it is necessary that, to the particle drive, the object should be added; but $\chi_{\omega \ell' i}$ expresses absolutely and alone the full idea of the relation to be noted; and therefore the introduction of the object is needless. So that we may say xople shall, or xople word vi; but we cannot say and shall and area word; neither did the Greeks say area word, but are vide word via so in that passage of Plato, voic maxor so in the New Testament, John xx. 7, xople is used simply and alone, but not area.

But since it is to be feared that, in the interpretation of important passages of the New Testament, the notice of this distinction may be thought unnecessary, as though it were of no moment whether any one is noted as absent from a certain thing, or whether the thing is regarded as separated from him, we will adduce one example in those expressions so abundantly discussed,-viz. xwels repos, and xwels leγων, Rom. iii. 21, 28; iv. 6; vii. 8, 9 t James ii. 20. Many have interpreted them as if Paul had said, that faith only is sufficient to a man's salvation, even though he lived wickedly; and, therefore, that man, although he do the works of the law, yet is accepted on account of faith alone; which idea is not only opposed to Paul's statement, but even to that of James, with which Luther was somewhat dissatisfied. For when Paul said, in Rom, ii, 13, oi wongrow row rhow dixeus Showres, he could not, after a short interval, have said also, that man shall be justified, even though the works of the law are wanting. James, however, appears as if he were opposing that idea; for he writes it igywr denaisus Sai ar Seman nal oux ex miorems moron. But the accordance is complete if we only consider accurately the proper force of the two particles under discussion. If Paul had written, aven ieyar, then his sentence would have contained the notion with which he is charged, and the argument of James would be in contradiction to him. For, if it is true that man is justified άνου ἔργων, i. e. works being altogether wanting or absent, then it follows, that works are not needed; that they may be wanting with perfect safety; and that is false which Paul has affirmed, rous mountas rou vousou dixasousas and the assertion of James would be false also, The miorie Twelf Two sexum reagan strais. But it is written, xwelf that it may not be supposed that works may be altogether wanting to him who has faith, but that his justification is separate from his works, i. e. although he had not done the works. Therefore, as in the first instance (iii. 21,) it is rightly stated; vuvi de xweis vomou dixasocura Seou moariguras, viz. that the divine compassion is manifested separately from the law (as it were not in connexion with the law, for by the law, which all have violated, is manifested not the downworm. but the wrath of God;) so also in another passage that Apostle has written, with equal correctness, dixagoudan aigre andeway, xwels sexun vopou; i. e. this dizaccoo'rn is altogether separated from the works of the law, and therefore applies itself to man, not because of the works of the law which he has done, (for he has not done them) but by faith. He does not say drawerοβαι ανβρωπον πίστει χωρίς έργων, i.e. τη ούα έχούση τὰ έργα, as James says; but δίχαιοῦσθαι χωρίς έργως Tiors, so that the dixagoding is shown not to be conjoined with the έργω νόμου, (as if any one, because he had done certain works of the law had therefore attained the dixalogum;) but simply by faith, although hitherto he had been utterly destitute of works. Wherefore, it is said, with equal accuracy in the third passage (iv. 6.) ω ο θεός λογίζεται δικαιοσύνην χωρίς έργων, i. e. although he have been destitute of works, in fact, although he has sinned, yet he describes him as blessed: μακάριος ανήρ ῷ οὐ μη λογίσηται κύριος αμαρ-On the contrary, James has spoken of faith, which, xwels raw egywe, is dead; that is, καθ' έαυτήν, έαν μη έργα έχη. For πίστις χωρίς τω ἔργων, is faith separate from works, ή οὐ συνηργοῦσα τοῖς ἔργοις, as Paul writes in Rom. vii. 8, 9, χωρίς νόμου άμαςτία νεκρά. έγω δε εζων χωρίς νόμου ποτε. If it had been aven vomon, both would have been false; for, rezeá # à μαργία εστι, sin is dead, not because the law is not present, but because sin is without the law; neither is the law the cause of sin, for the law is holy. And he did not live ἀνου νόμου, i. e. so that the law was not present, for the law was present, but he lived ignorant of the law. As ανευ νόμου ποιείν τι is to act contrary to law, so ζην ανευ νόμου is to live contrary to the law, or not to regard the law, to live as though there were no law. The Apostle says, that there was a time in which he lived unconstrained by the law, and in that time "sin was dead," but when he understood the precepts of the law, οὐκ ἐπιθυμήσεις, then the power of evil arose in him. Chrysostom erroneously supposes (and is followed, as usual, by Theophylact,) that this refers to a time in which the law was not present with him. Truly, therefore, Paul writes, έξ έχγων νόμου οὐ δικαιωθήσεται πασα σάεξ ειώπιον αὐτοῦ πάντες γάς ημαετον, but πεparieura vur xweis vouou dinaiooun Seou, not restricted by the law, without regard to the law; for if God had had respect to the law, he would not have given the dixalogum, he would have punished. Therefore, χωρίς εργων νόμου δικαιουται and some. But with equal truth James says, Fir storm xuels "eyen, i. e. free from works, is dead. For as all have come short of the glory of God, and therefore none it "eyen disantires, shall be justified by works, but by faith; so also faith should consequent rate separate and living energy. And this is the view of our church, as it is accurately shown by Melancthon in his Apologia.

And hence students should be admonished in the use of common and popular lexicons, not to suppose that particles of the same kind mean precisely the same thing, because they are often rendered in the lexicons by the same Latin word; for although

οῦπω and μήπω

are both rendered by nondum, yet undoubtedly they differ. For as οὐ and μή differ (on which point Hermann has written in his edition of Viger,) so also of necessity οὕπω and μήπω will differ; and so will their compounds οὐπέτι, μηπέτι, οὐδέποτε, μηδέποτε, &c. Neither would we regard it as a mere accident, that in Matth. xxiv. 6, we have οὕπω ἐστὶ τὸ τέλος, in John ii. 4, οὕπω ῆκει ἡ ῶξα μου, but in Rom. ix. 11, μήπω γὰς γεννηθέντων μηδε πραξάντων τὶ ἀγαθὸν ἥ κακόν, and in Heb. ix. 8, μήπω πεφανεςῶσθαι τὴν τῶν ἀγίων ὁδέκ. In the two former passages, we have a negation of the presence of a future thing. In the others, it is intimated, that one thing is done before that another thing is considered to be present, to which that appertains. If, therefore, (which could scarcely have been), it had been written μήπω ήπω ή δεα μου, it would have appeared uncertain whether that time would come, which many believed to be already present. But this was certain, that it would come, and it was beyond a doubt that the time was not yet come. The point denied, therefore, was, that the time was come. On the contrary, Paul could not have written ourse yaz yengsiran aira ifish. For he did not wish to intimate that such a thing was said, when the children were not born, as if they were born, but that it was said with a direct reference to their not being born; μηδὶ πράξαντις τὶ ἀγαθὸν ἢ κακόν. For the force of the argument lies in this, that in the decree of God all regard to fortuitous events is put out of the question. Wherefore if the Apostle had written ourw yering Serrar, he would have said, that the children were not born when this was said, yet that God knew that they were about to be born, and to act well or ill; and therefore that God decreed concerning men yet not born, as though they were; which idea is foreign to the mind of the Apostle, and has given rise to many painful discussions respecting the divine prescience. He wrote, therefore, μήπω, that the negation might be referred to the mind of God in the matter. There is a similar reason for the use of μήπω in the other passage, Heb. ix. 8. For it is not denied that the way was then opened; but it is said that the Spirit taught this; and therefore the negation is not to be referred to the matter itself which was absent, but to the thought, for the Spirit admonished men not to think that the way was opened. had written our mepareguoda, the notion of future time would have been introduced, as if the Spirit would teach that the odos ran ayiw was not opened, but that it would be subsequently, which it is evident the Apostle did not mean. Besides, as of negatives a thing simply, and ph as regarded in the thought, (Hermann ad Viger. p. 807.) so also οὖπω and μήπω differ in the same way. If I should say, ούπω τοῦτο, speaking of any act, I deny that it is yet done, but I infer that it may be done hereafter; but if I say μήπω I not only regard it as not done, but I doubt, or at least I do not in any way imply, whether it shall vet be done at any time. I doubt, therefore, whether it could be said in the two passages formerly quoted; μήπω έστι το τέλος, and μήπω ήπει ή ωρα μου, for by he particle μήπω the thought of the event occurring subsequently is put away. And thereiore in Xenoph. Memorab. iv. 4. 23, we find prosed to each other τὰ ἀκμάζοντα, τὰ μήπω ἐκμάζοντα and τὰ παςηκμακότα. Xenophon did not write τὰ οὖπω ἀκμάζοντα, because the time of the future ἀκμή was not thought of, and therefore it occurs immediately afterwards, τὰ τῶν μη ἀκμαζόντων οὐ σπουδαῖα. But to proceed.

I have at different times observed, that the lexicographers get into error in the explanation of compound words; thinking that as the one common notion of the simple word exists in its compounds, therefore the compounds cannot differ between themselves. For although at times it may seem to matter little which compound word a writer makes use of in a particular place, yet it is often needful for us to consider what is the specific force of each.

παταφεονεῖν περιφεονεῖν (ὑπερφεονεῖν)
are either of them rendered, to despise, to contemn, and so far they agree, that each signifies contempt. But the contempt of others is twofold in the cause and the mode of it, either when we think less of others than they deserve, or more of ourselves than we ought. The former idea would be expressed by παταφεονεῖν, the latter by περιφεονείν. Το this ὑπερφρονείν stands nearly related, as appears from a passage in Aristophanes, (Nubb. v. 226, 227.) where Socrates says, aseobara nal recipeora roi figior, Strepsiades would malignantly turn this, "wur' dan't railio" rous Seous interpressio. For he had said are prosess, which, as the Scholiast observes, danderhuarte ਫੈਰਾ।, και άντι τοῦ περισκοπῶ, και άντι τοῦ ὑπερφρονῶ. Strepsiades suggests therefore the word φρονείς, ϊνα διαβάλλη τον Σωκράτην υπερφρονούντα των Diav. as another Scholiast notices. For he who megipeover, i. e. studiously and ambitiously seeks divine things, runs the risk of thinking that he knows more than the Deity, i. e. bargφρονές. They therefore are said, ὑπερφρονές who appear to themselves to be wiser and more pru-If it is said simply, as in dent than others. Rom. xii. 3, un uneppeonen, nae' & des peonen, it signifies to think more of oneself than is right; for the words mag' o det ogover, explain the word υπερφεονείν, so that unless the consent of the various codices had confirmed the text, it might have been regarded as an explanatory gloss; for a few codices omit it. The contrary to this is σωφεριών; whence Hesychius writes, περφεονείς· περισωφρονείς· υπερφρονείς. In Titus therefore we find in c. ii. 15, sheyze aurous werd maons ἐπιταγῆς, μηδείς σου περιφρονείτω, " warn them most seriously, with all authority, that no one think himself above the need of admonition." if the admonition be only given κατά συγγνώμην (1 Cor. vii. 6,) it is to be feared lest the hearers should not regard it as applicable to them, and should treat it lightly. So also in Aeschines, ήδη περιφρονώ τοῦ ζῆν. For he is foolish who despises life. Neither was this the notion of Socrates: but he had learned from the instructions of this wonderfully wise man, or, n zára, η άνω, εὐδαιμονεῖν δεῖ τὸν βεβιωχότα εὐσεβῶς, and therefore he now feels himself to be superior, both to the pleasures of life and the fear of death, are sic ameina olnor meraornomenos. But a little before he had said καταφεονήσαι υπεεβαλλόντων 3ηείων Bias. But Paul writes to Timothy, 1 Tim. iv. 12, μηδείς σου της νεότητος καταφρονείτω, let no man despise thy youth, but be thou an example. It were false to say that here zarapgoven involves in it the having cause of contempt. The proper force of the word is evident in Matth. vi. 24. η ένός ανθέζεται, και τοῦ έτερου καταφρονέζε, he will disregard, neglect the other. So in Rom. ii. 4. της μακεοθυμίας τοῦ θεοῦ καταφεονείς, despisest thou, not knowing that the goodness of God, In 1 Timothy vi. 2, it is used in the same sense, οἱ πιστοὺς ἔχοντας δισπότας μὴ χαταφρονείτωσαν, ότι άδελφοί είσιν, άλλά μᾶλλον δουλευέτωσαν, but elliptically, the object being omitted. Finally, when in Heb. xii. 2, Jesus is said, a.oxions zarapponisas, it is manifest that the meaning is not that our Lord held himself above the force of contumely, but that he so disregarded or despised the shame, as that he was willing to endure the cross; which is the real force of the word.

Take another example of the words ἀπαλλάττειν διαλλάττειν παταλλάττειν ἀποπαταλλάττειν

These compounds of ἀλλάττων, which means strictly to change, (as it were, to do differently), either as to the thing itself, or the external condition and place of it, agree so far as this, that this original force of a change of state or mind exists in them all; but they differ as to the mode of thought, and are therefore properly accounted synonyms.

For ἀπαλλάττειν properly is to remove, and ἀπαλλάττεισθαι ἀπό τινος is to set free from some thing; and therefore, in Heb. ii. 15, it is said of one who, by a certain cause, is delivered and absolved, whether by a friendly paction of a judicial sentence; and more especially of the creditor or the accuser who dismisses the debto or the guilty. So, Luke xii. 58, ἐν τῆ ὁδῶ δὸ ἐργασίαν ἀπηλλάχθαι ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, which is usually rendered "Give diligence, that thou mayst be delivered from him, lest he should take thee to the judge." It differs from apsival; Demosthenes pro Phorm. (p. 952, Reisk.) xal boa 115 άφηχεν ή άπηλλαζεν et adv. Pantaen. (p. 966.) σερί ων αν τις αφείς και απαλλάξας δικάζεται (vid. vv. dd. ad Harpocrat. v. ἀφείς). It is worthy of notice also, that ἀπαλλάττων is said not only of the creditor who sets free the debtor, but of the debtor who satisfies his creditor: which has been shown in many instances by Raphelius and Elsnerk on the above passage, and in Dresigius de verbis mediis, p. 180. In this case, therefore, ἀπαλλάττισθαι must be understood of the debtor who, before he reaches the judge, would endeavour any how to satisfy his creditor, that he may let him go, and rather to sacrifice something than to stand a trial. And I rather agree with those who do not consider δὸς ἐργασίαν a Latinism, da operam, (in which sense I never met with the word), but

k Elsner, on this passage, says, "Beza has rendered this incorrectly, ut-libereris ab eo, when its real force is, that thou mayst depart from him," referring to Acts xix. 12, εστι απαλλασσισθαι ἀπ' αὐτῶν τὰς νόσους; or rather, "that you may be released by him, as appeased;" and quotes, in support of this, Aristoph. Nubib. 1194.

παρόντις οἱ Φιύγοντις ἡμίρα μιῷ πρότιρον, ἀπαλλάττοινθ ἔκοντις.—Τ.

that it refers to the sum or compensation given to appease the creditor. The same idea exists in the parallel passage Matth. v. 25, 7631 εὐνοῶν τῷ ἀντιδίχω του. These words are rightly explained by Zonaras, (p. 920, and Phavorinus), from an old commentator, καταδέχου μᾶλλου αδυκώθου; and hence it appears, that the word ἀνταλλάντων does not involve in it properly the notion of reconciling or appeasing, unless it flows from the thought that he who is sent away satisfied is appeased. But this idea will appear more plainly in the words diallarren and zarallarren.

They, however, differ; for διαλλάττων is said of many, καταλλάττων of one. The former is to cause a mutual enmity to cease, as in Xenophon, διαλλάττων τὰς τολημοῦσας πρὸς ἀλλήλους πόλως. So it occurs once in the New Testament, Matth. v. 24, διαλλάγηθι τῷ ἀδελφῷ σου. It does not mean here, see that he be reconciled to thee, but, see that ye be reconciled to each other. It is not sufficient that he should be no longer angry, but that both parties should be no longer angry, but that both parties should be on good terms. And hence, διαλλακτής is one who reconciles hostile parties. (See Hemsterhusius ad Thom. Mag. v. διηλλάγη.) Whilst καταλλάττων is strictly, so to act as that the opposite party may lay aside his enmity. Accuracy, therefore, required in the above passage of Matthew, διαλλάγηθι, not παταλλάγηθι; for the latter refers but to one party; the other to both. Neither is this contradicted by a passage in Thucydides (iv. 59.), where the Scholiast says, τὸ δὲ καταλλαγῆναι τὸ διαλλαγῆναι. For he does not say this without addition, and simply: but πρός άλλήλους καταλλαγηναι, which is in fact διαλλαγήναι. Hence, καταλλαγή, properly in the singular, is not a mutual reconciliation, but the conciliating of one party. Nor does Aristophanes, Avibus, v. 1597, appear to us to have written rashly, περί πολέμοιο καταλλαγής, and not, as the Grammarians would have it, xara >λαγῶν. For πόλεμος is taken collectively, as the one enmity of those parties warring, on the subsiding of which the war ceases, and dialλάστονται οἱ πολεμοῦντες. Certainly he could not have written περί πολέμοιο διαλλαγῶν, as it occurs in v. 1539, and v. 1584. So, in Romans xi. 15, the ή ἀποβολή τῶν Ἰουδαίων is said to be καταλλαγή πόσμου, the putting away of the Jews is the means of reconciliation to others: not that it is the cause of the union of Jews and Gentiles in the Christian community; for this would be unmeaning in itself, and foreign to the mind of the Apostle. Neither, in two other passages, Rom. v. 11, and 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, does xarallay) mean the remission of sins. as if God were appeased, and a mutual reconciliation takes place between God and man-In the former passage, undoubtedly, xarallari means the actual reconciliation of men by the death of Christ; for we being enemies xarnhλάγημεν; and not that God κατηλλάγη τῷ κοσμφ. In the other passage, the διακονία της καταλλαγής is not the office of teaching the doctrine of the remission of sins, i. e. of the expiation; but it is the office itself, as exercised by the Apostle, of advising, exhorting, beseeching men, καταλλάγητε τῷ θεῷ, i. e. the office of effecting the καταλλαγή. For it is not that God was the enemy of men; (John iii. 16,) nor was the object to be effected his reconciliation; but that men being ix 3001 TOU 9300, should return into favour with God; i. e. since by sin they are become adverse to the divine sanctity, and possess a carnal mind inimical to God, (Rom. viii. 7, τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρχὸς ἔχθρα εἰς 956,) and, therefore, have reason to fear his holy authority, (as it becomes those to do who have not been obedient to the law, and know that they cannot please God,) they may now return to favour with God; that, as is well expressed by Morus, they should not only cease to fear for themselves respecting God, but that they should cease from their resistance to his authority. We know how much it has obscured the doctrines of the Gospel, that interpreters have not distinguished with sufficient accuracy the words of sacred Scripture; but it is most abundantly shown, by means of this very word, how necessary it is to observe the strict and proper force of all words. We should be careful also not to confound γλασσειν and χαταλλάττειν, ίλασmbs is the cause for the which men may and ought παταλλαγήναι τῷ θεῷ. Neither is Christ called ¿ παταλλάσσων, as διαλλάσσων God and man; the word is applied to God himself, for truly it was God who was in χριστώ πόσμον παταλλάσσων έαυτῷ, μη λογιζόμενος αὐτοῖς τὰ παραπτώματα aira. Wherefore, we must not suppose that these words are said άνθεωποπαθῶς; for nothing can be said more truly worthy of the holiness and wisdom of the Almighty, than that which is contained in them; except we rashly mix up with them the unfounded notion of an appeasing of the divine anger.

But as the force of καταλλάσσειν, inasmuch as it differs from διαλλάσσειν, may be abundantly gathered from these passages of the New Testament, so also may it be traced in other Greek writers. So in the Cyrop. vi. 6, 2, Orontes is said καταλλαγείς Κύζω. Formerly he had made war on Cyrus, but now he dissembled with him, isuβουλεύω Κύρφ, and professed friendship. Cyrus, however, having discovered his deceit, complained of him, and δεξιών ελαβον και έδωκα. Josephus Ant. Iud. vi. 7, 4, παρακαλεί ήρξασα τὸ θεδη παταλλάστεσθαι τῷ Σαύλφ καὶ με χαλεπαίνεν» vii. 8, 4, τῷ σαυτοῦ παιδί καταλλάγηθο και τήν πρὸς αυτοι οργην άφες: opp. ఉπεχθεσθαι τῷ παιδί. And in Book iii. 15, 2, he says, that the Jews entreated Moses that he would be xaraddaxris airon meds our Seés, but that Moses refused, because God was not rashly, but deservedly angry with In Demosthenes we read, p. 189, 16, ed. Reisk. τοὺς Ελληνας ὁςῶν ὁςομένους ὁιαλλακτοῦ, i. e. who would conciliate the offended. Euripid. Iph. in Aul. v. 1157, οῦ σοι κασαλλαχθείκα περί σε και δόμους. conf. Helen. v. 1251. And in Sophocles, Ajac. v. 744, Δεοΐουν ώς χαταλλάχ Δη χόλου. Schol. όπως την έχθραν ἀπόθηται. This is said of Ajax, who, through his insanity, was offended with the gods. Further examples are needless.

We have only now to notice ἀποκαταλλάττιι, which only occurs twice in the New Testament, Ephes. ii. 16, καὶ ἀποκαταλλάξη τοὺς ἀμφοτέχους ἐν ἐνὶ σώματι τῷ Ͽεῷ. and Coloss. i. 20, καὶ ἀ ἀὐτοῦ ἀποκαταλλάξαι τὰ πάντα εἰς αὐτόν. The meaning in the former passage is explained by the Apostle himself in v. 15, ὁ παήσας τὰ ἀμφότεςα in the latter by signer unious, in both there is the same notion which we know to be the proper meaning of zaraλλάστων. For the notion of mutual alienation exists not so much in the word itself, as in the whole formula, as may be gathered from v. 22. But then in the word derecaλλάστων, there seems a greater force than in παταλλάστωι; for παταλλαγίστις, are they who return into favour with any one; but anexaraldayives, are they, who so lay aside their enmity that amity follows; nor does any impediment remain to their living accordantly ir in comer, the one head of which is Christ. Eph. i. 10, ἀνακιφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ. For though in words compounded of two or more prepositions we must not expect to find proportional emphasis, yet care must be

¹ That is emphasis, says Quintillian, ix. 2, where more is signified than is said; or as he says elsewhere, viii. 3, the existence of a deeper thought, than that which words seem to express. Ernesti states more correctly, (See Bibl. Cabinet, vol. i. p. 52.) "that emphasis is an accession to the accustomed meaning of the word; and he adds, in the next section, that no word is emphatic in itself; for every word has a certain definite meaning, and conveys a precise idea in which there can be no emphasis." And therefore emphasis, or additional force, must not be looked for, unless we gather from the mind of the speaker, that some additional force is intended to be added to the customary force of the word, or that the writer evidently meant more than the

taken, not to assume rashly that words of this kind mean only and precisely the same thing. The preposition and has this force, that if it be added to a compound verb, it increases its power, and indicates that the thing intended by that word is done altogether absolutely, or in a greater degree. So areadexectas is to expect constantly, not only for a certain time, but even to the end, till the expected event happens, Rom. viii. 19; 1 Cor. i. 7. The same remark will apply to aroxagadoxen, which Fischer labours to show (de Vit. Lex. N. T. p. 128.) does not differ from the simple word xagadoxsiv. We grant indeed, that emphasis must not be looked for, and that both words may be rendered by the same Latin word, expectare; but we deny that the force and meaning of both words is precisely the same, or that word which he has used conveys. Therefore in comparing such words as recedent, anaecolativ, anaecolativ indicata, anticata, anaecolativ, acolaticata, anaecolativ, acolaticata, anaecolativ, acolaticata, anaecolativ, acolaticata, anaecolaticata, anaecolati

Polybius, sometimes writing amonagadoneth, whilst in many other places he writes xaçadoxia, had no design in dropping the preposition, Certainly in those places which are adduced, it appears manifest that ἀποκαραδοκεῖν, is said of a man who expects an event, (as we say, abwarten.) So on that passage, in Zonaras and Suidas, the word ἀποκαραδικία, which is attributed to Polybius, ο δε καθήστο εν τῆ παςεμβολή, άποκαραδοκῶν, ὅποι καὶ τύχης χωρήσοι τὰ πράγματα. And in Excerpt. de Legat. s. n. 9. (p. 23. ed. Ursin.) συνεβούλευον αὐτῷ, πρεσβευτάς πέμπειν εἰς την 'Ρώμην ὑπερ συμμαχίας, Ϊνα μη δοκή τοῖς καιροῖς ένεδεείων ἀποκαραδοκεῖν την Αντιόχου παρουσίαν and again (n. 32. p. 65.): ἀπεκαραδόκει τούς ἐκ τῆς πόλεως, έπὶ τίνος ἔσονται γνώμης. In which passages, the potion here stated is very evident. Also in Polyb. xvi. 1, άπεκαραδόκει τὸν κίνδυνον. (conf. Joseph. B. i. iii. 7, 26.)

But παραδοκεῖ, which is properly to stretch forth the head, i. e. to direct the eyes to any thing, (as in Aristoph. Equit. v. 660, ἐπαρα-δόπησεν εἰς ἐμ' ἡ βουλὴ πάλεν. Schol. ἀπέβλεψεν) means by itself, according to my opinion, to observe diligently what may be done or may happen, and thence, to expect. And therefore, Hesychius says, παραδοκεῖ προςδοκεῖ, ἐπδέχεται, ἢ ἐπιτηρεῖ τὸ περάλαιον τοῦ πράγματος. And in this, Zonaras the Etymol. Mag., Suidas, and Timaeus agree. Whence also, diazagadoni, which word Touprestores for the word zagadoni, in Suidas, (See Emendat. in Suidam, p. ii. p. 310.) אין אינאין פֿאַנאַ מּעָנְאָלָאָנְאָנָאָיִ אָּנְאָנְאָנָאָרָ that is, we passed the whole night through expecting.

In this sense, xagadoxid is used by Polybius and others, but all will see that it is scarcely possible, but that in thought we shall subjoin the additional notion, which I have said to be peculiar to anonagadonin, viz. the expectation of the event, or happening, of a certain thing; for he who is interested in that which may happen, diligently watches all that is done, and does not expect in the sense in which the word spoedones would be used, i. e. to await the event, as we say, erwarten; but in the sense of observing, that he may consider what he should do, if the event occurs either the one way or the other. It is used simply by Philo. (vita Mos. p. 604. ed. Paris.) speaking of the sister of Moses, μιπρόν αποθεν επαραδόπει το αποβησόμου, which Clemens Alex. expresses by instrheu rd άποβησόμενον. (vid. Diodor. Sic. xix. 16, Xenoph. Mem. iii. 5, 6.) In Herodotus vii. 168, we find, παραδοπέοντες του πόλεμου ή πισειται. See Valckenar. who affirms that Diodorus Sic. speaking of the same thing, has written zagadonovirk πάς τοῦ πολέμου ἐοτάς. That προςδοχεῖν and καραδοκεῖν differ, will appear from Euripides, Rhes. π. 144. σάλπηγηος αὐδην προςδοχῶν καραδόκω.

The word amazagadoxía occurs twice in the New Testament; in Philipp. i. 20, zard rep ἀποκαραδοχίαν και ἐλπίδα μου, and Romans viii. 19, i accoraçadoría rãs reissus. In both places, the notion exists of an expected event. In the former passage, the Apostle said, however ill things went, yet he would be of good courage, because he knew δτι τοῦτο αὐτῷ ἀποβήσιται εἰς currefar; and he calls this anticipated prosperous issue ἀποκαραδοκία και ἐλπίς. And in the latter passage, the word could not properly be understood in the force of zeocdoxia, or simple expectation. It would be sadly tame if it were so rendered, ή ἀποκαραδοκία τῆς κτίσιως τὴν ἀποκά-Ander rar view rou Seou drendingeras, viz. the expectation of the creature (THE XTIGING) expects. It is rather the solicitous and anxious regard to. and desire of, the probable issue in afflictive circumstances, which looks for the ἀπιχάλυ-μης. Luther renders it well: das ängstliche Harren. But students should be warned not to allow themselves to imagine, that in the explanations of words given by the old lexicographers, all the words which they thus put down together have the same force and meaning; for they frequently use synonymous terms to explain an obscure word. Fischer is wrong in this respect when he endeavours to show that xagadexía and arexagadexía do not differ. He brings forward the authority of Hesychius, who says, that anoxagadonía is reocdonía. But, to return to the word αποκαταλλάττων. In this passage is recorded that great and extensive conversion of the state of things on earth which God has decreed to effect by Christ, that all men, freed from pride, covetousness, and the love of foolish vanities, and at length reconciled to God, zaralλαγέττις τῷ Βεῷ, encouraged by one hope, and seeking eternal life through one Saviour, should unite in one society or communion, ev evi σώμανι, of which the Lord himself is the head, of mugδόθη διά τά παραπτώματα ήμῶν καὶ ήγερθη διά τὴ δικαίωσιν ήμων. And if we do not yet see all nations, nor all professing Christians, realizing this wondrous benefit and blessing, though we do perceive πασαν την κτίσιν συστενάζειν και συνωδίκει Axer row vw, let us cleave more earnestly to the ἀποκαραδοκία και έλπίς of the Apostle; and while not unduly confident of our own state, but certainly not despairing of a prosperous issue in ernal felicity, ἀπεκδεχώμεθα την υίοθεσίαν, την οκάλυψιν τῶν υίῶν τοῦ θεοῦ. Εἰ γὰς ἔχθροι ὅντες τηλλάγημεν τῷ θεῷ, διὰ τοῦ θανάτου τοῦ υἰοῦ αὐτοῦ, λφ μᾶλλον καταλλαγέντες σωθησόμεθα ἐν τῆ ζωῆ τοῦ. For hereafter, πᾶσα ἡ κτίσις ἀπαλλαγήσεται; ματαιότητος by him, by means of whom God s decreed ἀποκαταλλάξαι τὰ πάντα εἰς αὐτόν.

That is, in the strict sense of the word synonym, as used by Titmann; words ranging together under a common genus, but having each a specific difference.—T.

CHAPTER VIII.

SUCH is the abundance of words in the Greek language, which may be accounted synonymous, that the further I proceed in these investigations, I see less reason to hope that I shall bring them to a close. For while my advancing years admonish me, the work grows on my hand; and the limits of such a work seem inadequate to include the many subjects before me. I would not, however, willingly fail those who have not been altogether dissatisfied with my labours, and therefore as yet I proceed in explaining the synonyms of the New Testament.

I would speak, therefore, now of those synonyms which are of frequent occurrence, but to which much difficulty attaches, because the difference existing between them is so frequently lost sight of in common use, that it may be doubted whether even the more elegant Greek writers have always correctly observedit. I speak of those words which relate to the senses, and to things applicable to the senses, such as words of hearing, seeing, feeling, and others;

rhich, when they are transferred to express the ets of mind, assume a very varied force and haracter. It occurs in all languages, that the otions of things which pertain to the mind nd its various offices, must be expressed by vords which have their origin in the several owers of the external senses. But since in Il perceptions there is a triple mode of percepion, either of the object perceived, or of the ubject affected, or of the thought which arises rom the relation of both, it follows that words rawn from the powers of the senses, when ransferred to the mind, or from the relation of xternal things, may be used in all the various nodes in which the mind is thus moved or ffected; although all these several modes may e found conjoined in the same perception. Whence, it may arise, that words of this kind nay appear to be capable of a promiscuous use, with no other object in view from their nterchange except a certain gratification of legant taste. So when Socrates, in Xenophon's Memorab. i. 4, 17, is related to nave said, τὸ σὸν μὲν ὅμμα δύνασθαι ἐπὶ σολλὰ στάδια Εικνείοβαι, τον δέ τοῦ θεοῦ δφθαλμον άδυνατον είναι άμα iárra degir there are few but would think that he difference between όμμα and ἐφθαλμόν was uch only, that it might have been written διμια θεοῦ and ἐφθαλμὸν ἀνθρώσου; yet I am quite convinced that Xenophon did not in this instance avoid as a matter of mere elegance the repetition of the same word, but that the use of each was justified by its own peculiar force and meaning. ἐφθαλμός may be applied to the deity, but ὅμμα can only be applied with propriety to men. But let us notice other examples.

βλέπειν δράν ideir öπτεσθαι θεασθαι (θεωρεί.)

Since the eyes are not only "the light of the body," but the sedulous ministers and satellites of the mind also, it is not surprising that the Greeks should have so many words, which relate properly to the use of the eyes. And the German language also, like the Greek, abounds in words which express the widely extensive functions of the eyes. Of those which occur in the New Testament, we may consider their several relation to, and difference from each other.

· βλέπειν is a word of wide extent. It is simply, to use the eyes, to see. He who has sight, βλέπει. It is used of those who recover sight, Luke vii. 21; Matth. xv. 31; John ix. 7. And often in the New Testament, τὰ βλεπόμεινα are, the things seen by the eyes (ἐραπά are the things which may be seen). Hence that Brisson det roof means to beware for oneself; for he who wishes to beware of any thing does not turn his eyes from it, (as they say the swallow does), but steadily looks at the object to be avoided: βλίσω μη πάσχη τι. But as βλίsur sis τ_i is to turn the eyes to a thing, so $\beta\lambda_i$ was date root is to turn away the eyes, as flying from it. In this formula, therefore, the idea is rather to avoid, and to fly from, than to beware of: and this is evident in Mark viii. 15, έρατε, βλόπετε ἀπό της ζύμης των φαρισαίων, i. e. beware of them, fly from them. Surely he would not twice say, beware; but he wished his disciples not to follow the hollow professions of these men, as xii. 38. And Matth. xvi. 6. içães, recosexers and rãs Chung r. p. But, in fact, these pages would not contain the examples. if we are to show how frequently all such formulae are confounded together in our lexicons.

The word ὁςᾶν differs from βλέπει in this, that although it means to see, yet it is referred to the thing seen, or presented to the eye. βλέπει is said of one who uses his eyes, even though he sees nothing; (βλέποντες οὐ βλέπουσι;) ὁςᾶ, of one who sees something. Hence δςαμα is that which is seen, δςασις the species or form of the thing which falls on the eye, δςατόν, that which the sentence; the composition of which requires that the time should be the same in which the man puts his hand to the plough and looks Besides, the person to which this relates, had asked permission, before he followed Christ, to bid his friends farewell, which would require him then actually to return home, whilst, at the same time, there existed in his mind the real intention of returning to follow the Lord Jesus, as others, v. 59, 60. It is not, therefore, the inconstancy and vacillation of the man that is thus reproved; for he had said without hesitation, "Lord, I will follow thee;" but that heavy and sensual mind, which even in such a crisis prevented the forgetfulness of external things, and by which the desire for the kingdom of God is repressed and deteriorated. Our Lord could not mean that this young man had already begun the work, which they affirm to be the meaning of δ ἐπιβαλών την χείζα αὐτοῦ ἐπ' ἄροτρον, and then wished to leave it as unwilling to return. Neither of these ideas agree with the account of this well-disposed youth; for he had not yet put his hand to the plough. And he was evidently wishing to return to the Lord Jesus, that he might follow him altogether. To me it appears, that Christ used the image merely of a labourer, who with it is βλέπετε τί άκοθετε, for which in Luke viii. 18. we have βλέσειτε σῶς ἀκούετε, as in Ephes. v. 15. βλέπετε πῶς ἀπριβῶς περιπατεῖτε. For in all these passages the proper force of the word is referred to the mind, and therefore Brisson may be joined with axous; but it could not have been, içães rí azouses; for ição is always referred to the object seen, and no good writer would have used it otherwise. And as there is in the word bear this force, which we call objective, hence it arises that it is joined with those prepositions only, by which the thought is referred to the object seen. For in the compound word apoear there is a twofold force in the preposition; one, by which the force of the word is removed, so that it signifies, to look away, as in Cyrop. vii. 1. 36, παίουσιν ἀφοςῶντας, for they smote the backs of the Egyptians; another which intimates that the thing itself is removed from the subject to which the word refers. So Herodot. viii. 37, as wifeon to igon. For it was to the Delphi, and not to the temple, that the barbarians had approached, as the sequel shows. Although, therefore, it is allowable to say Briens and those, yet it would be absurd to say ição ἀπό τινος. And if any one says that, in the interpretation of the New Testament, such subtilties are unnecessary, I would have him written dadin; but it is properly seeing, for the word Blistowas belongs not only to zupois, but to xullous and the other words in the sentence. Men may quote, Apoc. i. 12, ἐκίστρε-ψα βλίπα την φωτήν ή τις ελάλησε μετ' έμου. But even here. βλέπει is not to hear. It were needless to say: "He turned to hear the voice," for he had heard it; but he turned that he might ascertain from whence the voice came. Equally wide of the mark are the passages adduced from Greek writers. For in these the words is redu and begin, do not mean to hear; but to perceive mentally whether by seeing or hearing, as in Aeschylus. (Prom. vinct. v. 21.) h' ours pouris, ούτε τοι μορφήν όψει (conf. Sophoel. Trach. v. 365.

That βλέπειν only denotes the act of seeing, without any thought of the object presented to the sight, will appear also from the fact that βλέμμα does not signify the thing seen, as δραμα, but the eye, or the aspect in which we see. And hence, finally, we arrive at the explanation of that formula, which occurs twice in the New Testament, βλέπειν ἀπό τινος. There it is said, that βλέπειν is to beware; but, at the outset, they rashly confound this formula with another, βλέπε μή, from which it widely differs. But, besides this, it is impossible to make out that βλέπειν ἀπό τινος means to beware for oneself: for he who wishes to beware of any thing does not turn his eyes from it, (as they say the swallow does), but steadily looks at the object to be avoided; $\beta\lambda i\pi u$ μn $\pi \alpha \sigma \chi n$ τi . But as $\beta\lambda i$ were sig is to turn the eyes to a thing, so $\beta\lambda$ iwas ἀπό τινος is to turn away the eyes, as flying from it. In this formula, therefore, the idea is rather to avoid, and to fly from, than to beware of; and this is evident in Mark viii. 15, έρατε, βλέπετε ἀπό της ζύμης των φαρισαίων, i. e. beware of them, fly from them. Surely he would not twice say, beware; but he wished his disciples not to follow the hollow professions of these men, as xii. 38. And Matth. xvi. 6. όρᾶτε, προσέχετε ἀπό τῆς ζύμης τ. φ. But, in fact, these pages would not contain the examples. if we are to show how frequently all such formulae are confounded together in our lexicons.

The word ὁρᾶν differs from βλέπει in this, that although it means to see, yet it is referred to the thing seen, or presented to the eye. βλέπει is said of one who uses his eyes, even though he sees nothing; (βλέποιτες οὐ βλέποισες) ὁςᾶ, of one who sees something. Hence δ₂αμα is that which is seen, δρασις the species or form of the thing which falls on the eye, δραπόν, that which it submitted to sight, which is visible. And ¿ão is never used absolutely, but as associated with the thought of that which is looked at But as it becomes him who would avoid error or deception, diligently to circumspect and to observe all things, we may comprehend how these expressions, sea, dears, dears un signify, take care, see that, beware lest. And in this way we explain Heb. viii. 5, & runous. Moses is warned to observe accurately the intended building, that it may be made according to the pattern. But when we say oρars, oρars μη, we require those who are about to do any thing, to examine in the first place cautiously, lest they do that which they ought not to do. And although in both forms, içan μή and βλίπτει μή, the notion of being ware, exists; yet they differ. For as Blissers, without a negation, signifies only, use your eyes, that you may see correctly, as in 1 Cor. x. 18, Philip. iii. 2, so igar has this force, that we command the eyes or the mind to turn to the object. It is said, therefore, correctly in Acts xxii. 26, δρα τί μέλλεις ποιείν. And βλέπε could not have been used, for the centurion is admonished that he may look at what he is about to do. lest he command a Roman citizen to be scourged. On the contrary, in Mark iv. 24, it is βλέπετε τι άχούετε, for which in Luke viii. 18. we have βλίπετε πῶς ἀκούετε, as in Ephes. v. 15. βλέπετε πῶς ἀκριβῶς περιπατεῖτε. For in all these passages the proper force of the word is referred to the mind, and therefore Brissen may be joined with axous; but it could not have been, içães rí axouses; for içãe is always referred to the object seen, and no good writer would have used it otherwise. And as there is in the word bear this force, which we call objective, hence it arises that it is joined with those prepositions only, by which the thought is referred to the object seen. For in the compound word appear there is a twofold force in the preposition; one, by which the force of the word is removed, so that it signifies, to look away, as in Cyrop. vii. 1. 36, παίουσιν άφοςῶντας, for they smote the backs of the Egyptians; another which intimates that the thing itself is removed from the subject to which the word refers. So Herodot. viii. 37, as wegger to igor. For it was to the Delphi, and not to the temple, that the barbarians had approached, as the sequel shows. Although, therefore, it is allowable to say βλέπειν ἀπό τινος, yet it would be absurd to say હેલ્લા લંજાઇ જામાંદ્ર. And if any one says that, in the interpretation of the New Testament, such subtilties are unnecessary, I would have him to consider why he would himself feel it improper to say, βλόπια τὸ διάι, βλόπια τὸ πατίρα, speaking of the Deity, or βλόπια ἐαυτάι, (βλόπια εἰς αὐτάι is a different matter,) or why the Greeks speaking of the situation of a region, &c., always use βλόπια and never ἐρᾶκ.

We come next to consider iden, which so far differs from dean, that it must be referred rather to the mind of him who sees; so that as ear regards the object, idea should be referred in thought to the subject. No accurate observer will deny that this is the force of the word. For what other reason is there why the word iden does not occur even among the most ancient writers in the present, whether it is used to denote seeing or knowing, except it be that there exists in it properly the notion of a thing past, from which that very thing arises, which is now thought to be, i. e. the having seen or known something; and therefore now to know it and to have it ascertained; whence it follows that olda, idou, idou, have the notion of time present. Nor do I fear the adduction of some passages in Homer, in which the present time For in these the word either has a future sense, as Iliad. 9, v. 18, "va elders warre. σ, v. 53, κλύτε -- όφε' εὖ πάσαι Είδετ' ακούουσαι. Odyss. 1, v. 17, soga zal unsic Eider; or a passive sense, in which the idea is not that any one has seen a certain thing, but that this thing appeared to him, that it was seen, as Iliad. a, v. 228. τὸ δέ τοι κής εἴδεται εἴναι, 3, v. 559. πάντα δέ r' siderai acrea. v. v. 98. vũ vòn siderai nuae. E, v. 472. ου μέν μοι κακός είδεται. ω, ν. 197. τί τοι φρεσίν είδεται Hence also, 17005 denotes not that which we see, τὸ ὅραμα; but the image of the thing, the species or form presented to the mind. this sense it occurs in 1 Thess. v. 22, and marris, sidous womeoù awexers, which some render, "abstain from every kind of evil." But Luther more correctly, meidet allen bösen Schein." For it might have been written according to the former rendering, ἀπὸ παντὸς εἴδους πονηρίας, (Joseph. Antiq. x. 3, 1. See Wetstein in loc.) but it should have been από παντός εἴδους τοῦ πονηgou. But sloof morngor is a disreputable or wicked appearance or mode, as sldos aloxed in Euripides is an ungraceful form. On the other hand, in 2 Corinth. v. 7, the words did mioreus περιπατούμεν, οὐ διὰ εἴδους, Luther has very accurately given, as to the general sense: wir leben im Glauben nicht im Schauen. terpreters say that in this place sloop is the same as 5415. Yet it may be doubted whether 1806 has not still its proper sense; not only because it is never used for off; but that the Apostle does not appear to have entertained this idea: we now believe these things only, but we do not see them, i. e. have not realized them. For he exhorts them to be cheerful, and to trust God, who gives the earnest of the Spirit, inasmuch as they know that now they are pilgrim exiles from God, and should therefore desire rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord. Finally, regenerate διά πίστεως appears to differ from the expression περιπατείν έν τινί, which sometimes occurs. I doubt not but that these words may be explained from usage among the Greeks, as Valkenar. has shown on Euripides, Phoeniss. (p. 177. to v. 482. compared with v. 1555,) so that περιπατεῖν διὰ πίστεως is shown to be equivalent to πιστεύοντα περιπατεῖν, i. e. to live by faith. So in Aeschylus. Prometh. v. 120, vòr xão: Swi; δι άπεχθείας ελθόντα, i. e. is hateful to the gods; and in Euripides, Hippol. v. 1164, & Ex Space μων τις ήν άφιγμένος, i. e. by my hostile mind, and in the Orestes v. 755, διά φόβου γάς εχομαι. also in the Epist. to the Romans, c. iv. v. 11, των πιστευόντων δι' άκροβυστίας, and xiv. 20, τῷ διὰ προσχόμματος ioθίοντι. And in the same way we may explain that difficult passage in 2 Pet. iii. 5. δι ών ο τότε πόσμος ύδατι παταπλυσθείς απώλετυ. See Markland on Lysias, p. 329, Reisk's edition. In fact sloss is the external form and species of things, as is generally admitted; and therefore di sidous asperaren is so to live, that the sidos is as it were the companion of our life, to live intimately associated with the external form of things. But it becomes not the Christian to yearn after outward things, or to be ensnared by their glitter. It behoves him to seek higher things, and therefore θαξξοῦσι μᾶλλον ἐκδημῆσαι ἐκ τοῦ σώματος και ἐνδημῆσαι πεδς τὸν Κύειον. I conceive the meaning of the passage, therefore, to be: Our life is governed by our immortal hope, not by the vain hope of present things, we prefer, however, to leave the body, that we may go into the presence of God.

^a The English version is, "from every appearance of evil," which accords with M. Titmann's view. It does not mean evil presented to us, but evil appearance or semblance in us.—T.

Between ogar and idea there is a middle term, barreda. For it is referred, at the same time, to the object presented to the eye, and to the subject which sees and perceives. And hence it will appear why the word is only used in the passive and middle voice, and why it is not found in the present tense. For, as it does not denote the action of seeing, but the state of him to whose eye or mind the object is presented, the active power would not properly express this; and therefore, the word must be in the middle or passive voice; in the passive when any thing is said to be presented, or to appear to our mind; in the middle, when the thought is rather of some object presented to, or fixed in the eye or the mind, that we may perceive it. Whence also, it is put either in the past or the future, since the accurate notion of the word requires that that must be regarded as to have been done, or to be about to be done, by which we are to arrive at cognizance. For the specific power of this word is not that it denotes the action of seeing, but the state or affection of the mind to which the object is presented. It differs, therefore, from the words βλέπειν and δρᾶν, which denote the action of seeing, and from ideiv, which is referred only to the subject. Nor are passages wanting in which this specific force of the word is evident. It is rightly said in Matthew v. 8, 6- orran son Sein; for this does not mean that they shall actually see God, which could not be; but they shall truly comprehend and know him; as 1 John iii. 2, όψόμεθα αὐτὸν καθώς ἐστι, and Heb. xii. 14, χωρίς άγιασμοῦ οὐδείς όψεται τὸν κύριον. For I doubt whether, in these words, & Jorras ron Seón, we have the notion of a more familiar and nearer intercourse with God, as the lexicons tell us.

I rather think they intimate the felicity of those who more accurately perceive and appreciate the wisdom, holiness, and love of God, which felicity can only be realized by the na Sacol vã xacona. For truly is it said by Callimachus, (in Apoll. v. 7. 9,) ὁ θεὸς οὐα ἔτι μακράν, yet οὐ παντί φαείνεται, άλλ' ὅ, τις ἐσβλός. therefore, when (Eurip. Bacch. v. 501,) Pentheus inquires impiously, "Where is God?" he is answered deservedly, Tag' i und où d' acs Bas airòc an oux sicoeac: where sicoean is the same as Tarredau, inne werden. Acutely, therefore, Plutarch (de Ei) says, that Apollo was IIi Sior rois αρχομένοις μανθάνειν και διαπυνθάνεσθαι, Δήλιον δε καί Φαναΐον, οίς ήδη τι δηλούται και ύποφαίνεται της άλη-Suas. And Homer says, où yág wa wárreggi Seol φαίνονται έναργείς. (Odyss. π, v. 161.)

It must not be denied, however, that the words ὅπτεσθαι and ὁςᾶν are sometimes interchanged, so that ὅπτεσθαι appears to mean no more than ὁςᾶν. So in Xenophon, (Cyneg. v. 31.) βαδίζοντα δὲ οὐδεὶς ἐώραπεν οὐδ ὅψεται; and in the New Testament it is often put for ὁςᾶν, as Matth. xxiv. 30; xxvi. 64; John i. 51, 52; xi. 40; Acts xx. 25. But it does not follow from this that it has the same force altogether as ὁςαν, ἰδεῖν, βλέπειν; so that in any place in which it occurs, any one of these might be substituted.

Nor do I fear the remark, that "arradau is used, because the words iga and side would change the time from the future. For we have yet to learn why the future of iga is unused, as the same verb is without the agrist."

. I rather think that we must look for the explanation of these irregularities and deficiencies in verbs of very early use, to their etymology rather than to the caprice of later nations, into which the word was introduced, in the neglect of certain tenses and inflections. The more simple explanstion of these anomalies is, that the word has continued to be used in the later language, into which it has been derived, in the same tenses only in which it occurred in the primitive form, and has not undergone all the artificial grammatical inflections to which words of more recent formation were submitted. Such is probably the case in this instance. The Greek word igas is one of the few remnants of the Hebrew word 737, to see. The word being composed of one consonant, and two almost, if not altogether, vowel sounds, would be a bad subject for all the niceties of Greek inflection; and hence, as more convenient words would readily occur, the word in except in the instances in which it would slide gradually into use in its primitive form, would be avoided. That the Hebrew word has been thus brought into use in later languages is evident from other remnants of it. It is found in the English words ray and array, and the French, rayon. And it is the etv. mon of the Latin, ratio, and our English word, reason. Both in Chaldee and in Arabic, the word הואם, occurs in the sense of mental perception, understanding; and it is in this sense that it has been retained in the words ratio and reason. I have no doubt that an accurate examination of

There is yet something more in the word inversalau, because, as I have said, it should not be eferred only to the object, but to the subject also. It may be sometimes written of: as μείζονα τούτων όψει όψει την δόξαν του θεου, when nothing more is intended than that something is to be seen. But Matth. xxvii. 4, and Acts xviii. 15, σὸ ὄψει and ὄψεσθε αὐτοί were written. For there is a difference between or bea, and ου όψω. For ου δια, is, look accurately, consider, examine; but où ou is like the Latin, tu videris (from which formula, tu vide, differs.) It means, it is for you to examine, consider, regard. He who says où oga commands it to be done; he who says où only permits another to do it, and denies that he himself will do it. Wherefore où or auraí or some other pronoun is added, as putting away the duty from the speaker: for instance in Arrian diss. i. 17. of orras of άλλοι, εἰ λυσιτελεῖ αὐτοῖς παρὰ φύσιν ἔχειν. This appears distinctly in Acts xviii. 15, εὶ ζήτημά ἐστι περί λόγου — οψεσθε αὐτοί for it is added κριτής γάρ έγω τούτων οὐ βούλομω είναι. In this sense οὺ ὅξα is never found.

We have yet to notice Stão Sau and Stωρεπ. Both differ so far from the words noticed above, the defective Greek verbs, and their anomalous combinations, would fully bear out the remarks made above.—T.

that they denote the intention of mind with which a man regards or contemplates an ob-They are frequently used, therefore, when the desire of seeing is to be expressed So Matth. xi. 7, rí schadere deágagdas, i. e. rí iğedSorreç iSidere ogar. Matth. xxii. 11. And in John xiv. 17, or où Dewest avré oude yirwanes avré, we must not render this simply, sees, knows, understands, (which is in the force of the word ywwoxu, for it is a very unsound remark made by some, that in this place yirwoxen and Seween may be used for one another.) It should be translated. he did not studiously and attentively consider, and therefore he did not understand. For in Matth. vi. 1, πεδς το θεαθήναι αὐτοῖς (and Matth. xxiii. 5,) does not mean simply, to be seen, but to be seen with regard and admiration. are passages undoubtedly in which Siacola means only to see, as Matth. xvi. 11; Luke v. But there are others in which the pecu-27. liar force is manifest, and in which it has always the adjunct notion of the desire and intention to consider and know the thing looked In Rom. xv. 24, ἐλπίζω διαπορευόμενος θεάσασθαι ὑμᾶς, Paul not only says that he would see them, but that he would look diligently into their affairs. So Lucian (Nigrin. 2. i. p. 40.) βουλόμενος ιατερν όφθαλμων θεάσασθαί τινα, i. e.

P The peculiarity of the word Swew is very beautifully illustrated by a reference to the etymology. This is one of those instances in which the more extensively the inquiry is carried on, the more bright and certain is the result. stead of wild and uncertain conjecture, we arrive at little short of demonstration and definite certainty. In the first place, there is evidently a close connection between the words San. video cum stupore, Sianum, specto, contemplor, Sia spectatio, Isia, cum admiratione specto, (Ionice) Isagia, contemplor, and the Latin Tueo, Tueor, to behold, to look stedfastly. Both in the Latin and Greek word, there is the idea of stedfast considerate observing, and contemplation. The probability then is, that these words had a common On turning to the ancient oriental tongues, we find the word, and used in Hebrew, Chaldee and Syriac, very extensively in the sense, to see; but generally in a still stronger sense, as intimating serious and intense contemplation. In all these three cognate dialects, it signifies the seeing into obscure, mysterious, and future things: videns, propheta, or seer, attentio, consideratio, contemplatio, spectatio cum voluptate.

In the first place, we find, on examination, some remains and it could not have been investa a Samment; and it could not have been investa a Samment; and how then could the sentence have meant to experience for ever? But since Sampin is not merely the act of an instant, (for the things on which we Sampin, are considered as contemplated for a lengthened period), therefore, this word is very properly made use of in conjunction with it, the aliance. For this clause could not properly be rendered "he shall never die." For they also die who walk in the way of heavenly truth; but then their death is not if, the aliance. Here, however, we must for the present pause.

CHAPTER IX.

Many affections and conditions of the mind are so nearly allied, that they appear to differ in a very slight degree; more especially as the mode in which they arise and show themselves is very similar. On this account, we find that many words by which the condition of mind is expressed are not only used indifferently by inaccurate writers and speakers, but even by lexicographers are rendered by the same Latin words, as if they had no difference; and, by these means, recent and raw scholars are misled to suppose that they are identical in meaning. But where terms are really synonymous, their force should be most minutely observed; for this is absolutely necessary to the right understanding of the writers of the New Testament. Although, at the same time, it must be admitted, that in the customary style of language which these men used, the difference between such words was not always observed, especially those which properly express the different grades of the same affection. For those whose affections are more easily moved would natu-

sires, δταν βούλεοθε, if he pleases, βούλομαι αυθίσθαι sue airou, I wish to know from him fich wantele von ihm zu hören.) Xenophon Cyrop. i. 4, 10, τούτα λαβών διαδίδου δεφ ού βούλες παι τών άλλον inter iSixsic. And iv. 5. 12, (31.) out imaggun, ούχ όπως αν έθελωσα, άλλί όπως αν ού βούλη, χεήσθα avroit. And vii. 2. 4, (9.) derde, & Keolou, &e av er μοι έθελήσαις συμβουλεύσαι; Καλ βουλοίμην γ' κα, έρη, dyaSóv 71 ou sigein. There is something bland and respectful and courteous in the reply of Croesus, but in the question of Cyrus nothing but this: what is your will? Whence it occurs often that he who replies to such an interrogation, that he wills; does not reply by θέλειν but by βούλεσθαι. I will add two passages from Euripides, which will illustrate the difference I wish to point out. The first is in Iphig. Aul. v. 338, where Menelaus reproves the altered manner of Agamemnon, as widely differing from that which he dissembled, before he obtained the kingdom, ro done with wir oux γρήζων, τω δε βούλεσθαι θέλων. The other is in the Hyppolytus v. 1329, 1330, oddele anamar βούλεται προθυμία τη του θέλοντος, άλλ' άφιστάμεσθ Arrian. Diss. Epict. i. 12. 13, βούλομαι γιάφειν το Δέωνος ονομα ώς θέλω. And so in Matth. i. 19, δίπαιος ών και μη θέλων αυτήν παραδεγματίσαι, iβουλήθη λάθεα ἀπολῦσαι αὐτήν. But in this use of these words, I think I perceive other traces of the specific sense of each. First, it is well known that Books Bas n is frequently used in the sense of malle, to prefer, so that makker should be understood. But as far as I know, Sélan is For the passages adduced in never so used. support of the notion appear to me insufficient. And first, we may notice in the New Testament, 1 Cor. xiv. 19, ἀλλ΄ ἐν ἐχχλησία θέλω πέννε λόγους διά τοῦ τοός μου λαλήσου, ενα και άλλους κατηχήσω, η μυρίους λόγους εν γλώσση. But here, to my mind, the " must be referred rather to wire than to Séλω. I would, in the church, rather use five intelligible words, then ten thousand which were unintelligible. Another passage is in Xenophon de Mag. Equ. 9. 5, ols na Shasi ro

The only trace of an oriental etymon of βουλομαι that I can find is,) [1], a word existing in Hebrew and its cognate dialects, and implying complete power and authority. It is used in the sense of, dominus, maritus; used of those who are understood to have the right to express a sovereign will. And all the derivatives of βουλομαι remaining in Latin and Gothic, and in modern languages, volo, wilgan, vouloir, wollen, to will, are expressions of a positive determination. This rather makes against the distinction which the author has endeavoured to establish. At the same time, the usus lequends might have affixed a specific sense to the Greek derivative. And this is very probable, for in this limited sense we find in German the word willig, unwillig, implying propension. Anglice, willing, unwilling.— F.

εππικόν, εθέλουσι τελείν άργύριον ώς με iππεύειν, in which they render idenous by malunt, they prefer; μᾶλλον being understood. But it is not ή, but is má that follows, to make the sense: they would rather pay the fine than serve in the cavalry. And it may even be doubted in those passages in which μᾶλλον is inserted, ibid. 2. 8, and 9. For in both it may be rendered, more freely, more readily, to fight or to counsel, as Cyrop. iv. 3. 1, μᾶλλον μάχωντ' αν, εί τὰ φίλτατα ragin. comp. Memorab. iv. 4, 17. The reason of this use of the word must be sought in its specific signification. For since θέλειν means simply to wish, if n is added or understood, it would then signify, to wish this or that, v. c. θέλεις μάχεσθαι η φυγείν. And if μαλλον is added, it is not to be referred to Séren: but to the thing itself which is willed; as appears in the passages already referred to. On the two passages in Homer Il. 9, 319. Od. a, 234. see Butmann, l. c. p. 30. Justin. Mart. Apol. ii. Βέλει γάς ο πατής ο οὐςάνιος την μετάνοιαν τοῦ άμαςτωλοῦ, ἢ τὴν κόλασιν αὐτοῦ, where Sylburg supplies μαλλον, and adduces θέλω τύχης σταλαγμών η πίθου ogerw. See Eustath. ad Il. p. 1363, 42. I add a passage from Epigr. Agathiae xxv. Anal. iii. 43, ἐπεί σεο μύθον ἀχούειν "Ηθελον, ἢ χιθάρης χαρούματα Δηλιάδος. But the Greek language was then declining, of which this is an example, among many others.

A second proof of the specific signification of these words, is to be found in a different use of them, in passages where neither of them means properly, to will. There are many passages in which is in appears to have the same force with δύνασθαι or μέλλειν. Gregory of Corinth says, that this was Attic Greek. this sense, however, the word was only applied to inanimate objects. For the observation of Buttmann (Addenda to Plato Charm. p. 60) is quite true, that θέλειν for μέλλειν or δύνασθαι, is only used respecting inanimate objects, and then only in a negative sense. For the passages adduced do not prove that later writers have used it. Certainly Reisk ought not to adduce that passage from the 37th epigram of "Επταρον άγχι τάφοιο και ήθελον Macedonius. αὐτὸς ἀκοῦσαι, Οἶά πες ἀϊσάμην, μοῖςαν ἐμῆς ἀλόχου. For he did not hope that he should hear the death of his wife; but he thought, since he had sneezed, that he heard the presage of her death; (as we say, er wollte das selbst gehört, gesehn haben.) And therefore the word adros is not to be pressed. Wherefore Schaefer, apud Gregorium, p. 135, has said, that we should read οὐ δύναται. Plato in Phaedr. p. 230. D. τὰ μὶν our χωρία και τὰ δένδρα εὐδιν μ' ἐΘέλω ἀνδάσκεν. And Xenoph. Hist. Gr. v. 4. 61, τὰ πλώα ἐκείθε εὐκέντ ἢθελε παραπλεῖλ. Memor. iii. 12. extr. ἀ γὰρ ἐθέλει αὐτόματα εἶναι. So also it is assumed that in the New Testament John vii. 1, and Matth. ii. 18, αὐ θέλειν is put for σὐ δύναισθαι. But there is no need in either case to abandon the proper meaning of the word. In the former case he would not (noluit) stay in Judea, because the Jews sought to kill him; in the latter, Rachel would not be comforted. (German, sie wollte sich nicht trösten lassen,) as in Gen. xxxvii. 35, οὐκ ἢθελε παραπαλεῖσθαι, λίγων. In the Hebrew, it is ΦΙΤΙΤΙΚ ΤΙΚΕΝΤΙΚ, i. e. she refused consolation. Without the negative, however,

It is somewhat strange that Titmann did not refer to Jeremiah xxxi. 15, as the original of the quotation in Matthew, and which completely bears out his idea. The words are TINIO, refusing to be comforted. The word invariably occurs in the Hebrew Scriptures, in the sense of, determined refusal. And so in this case, it was not only that Rachel could not be comforted, because her children were not; but she refused all consolation, of whatever kind, from the bitter sense which she had of their loss. The full force of the word may be seen in Exod. ix. 2, TIN NOTION, if thou refuse to let them go. And seeing that the meaning of NOTING is so unequivocal, it is not at all probable that the LXX used obs. #9224 in the unusual sense of ob diverse. The etymology of NOTING is probably the Sixon is rather to be wont, to suit, to become. Herodot. vii. 50. 1. 2, μεγάλα πεήγματα μεγάλωσι έβάλω πιοδύνοισι παταιχώσθαι, (as we say: wollen unternommen sein); Callim. H. in Del. v. 4, Δηλος & એક્સિકા જ્લે જિલ્લાજ φέρεσωαι 'Επ μουσέων. conf. Aristoph. Av. v. 532, et Raphel. ad Actor. ii. 12. And it is observed by some critics, as Valckenar, in the 2d vol. of his Opuscula, p. 307, on Mark vi. 5, that our hours is put for our 3) Sale, or οὐκ ἐβαύλετο. And Henry Stephen had already remarked, App. de Dial. Att. p. 50, that the Attics sometimes put δύνασθαι for βούλεσθαι. But although there may be passages in which a man might say où duvacaa, because he had good reason to refuse, as in our language we say, we cannot, because we will not, I suspect none will be found in which où δύνασθαι has the same force with οὐ θέλειν. Certainly, in the passage quoted from Mark, there is no reason to abandon the usual meaning of the word. The words are, και οὐκ ἡδύνατο ἐκεῖ οὐδεμίαν δύναμιν சுவர்கவ. Evidently, as it is natural to admit that our Lord could have wrought miracles in that place, if he would, it is said, oux hours, instead of our Baks. For of that which cannot honestly and rightly be done, we may say with propriety, that a good man is unable to do it, although he could, if he would. And therefore, our Lord, although he was never without the power of working miracles, may be said properly to have been unable to do so among this people. For he never used the power of working miracles rashly, either in the presence of the wicked, or for the sole object of exciting a profitless surprise or admiration. not therefore work miracles there. not do so in accordance with his own wise moderation; for, "because of their unbelief," this display of power would have been utterly useless. He would not, therefore, because he could not with propriety. The same explanation may be given of a passage in the Anabas. vii. 2. 18, οὐκ ἡδυνάμην ζῆν εἰς ἀλλοτείαν τεάπεζαν ἀπο βλέπων, he could not, for he was ashamed. Sometimes, however, another passage is brought forward: Book ii. 2. 6, no de aven n organnyia οὐδεν ἄλλο δυναμένη, η ἀποδεᾶναι η ἀποφυγεῖν; in which they say that δυναμένη is put for Θέλουσα, i. e. it saw nothing else to be done. But there is no need to shrink from the usual meaning of the word. Certainly what the organnyia looked for

was already stated, that they might escape secretly and fly. Now, it is related that things took a turn for the better. He said therefore, the στρατηγία could do nothing else; but fortune κάλλιον ἐστρατήγησε. Finally, in Cyrop. vi. 4. 11, they adduce οὐ πρόσθεν ἐδύναντο θεάσασθαι αὐτόν, because all were taken with the beauty of Panthea. This distracted their attention, and prevented them from looking at her husband, i. e. they could not.

But, to return; où Bédes is sometimes the same in force with οὐ δύνασθαι; but βούλεσθαι is never used for δύνασθαι; and undoubtedly βούλεσθαι and δύνασθαι are often opposed to each other. Plat. Hipp. mai. p. 1259. A, οὐχ οΐα βούλεταί τις, άλλ' οδα δύναται. Lucian. ii. Abd. 179. ου βούλομαι δυνάμενος, and μη βούλεσθαι, μη δύνασθαι, ibid. p. 182. Aristot. Polit. v. 5. 9, wore xal βούλονται μαλλον και δύνανται νεωτερίζεν, ibid. c. 8. Vid. Valckenar. ad Phalar. ep. xcvi. p. 272. In the New Testament, it is improperly rendered posse, valere, as Acts xvii. 15, zerris yde έγω τούτων οὐ βούλομαι είναι; as Plat. Phileb. p. 38. C. βούλεσθαι πρίνειν. It is rather nolo, I refuse, in the sense in which we say, Ich mag nicht, I may not. Such questions are not my duty. If it were a question of any crime (v. 14), then χατά λόγον αν ήνεσχόμην υμών, I would hear you.

In the word Boundon there is rather the notion of the mind desiring, choosing, propensed to, a particular object. Often, indeed, we desire and choose that which cannot be: but to will impossibilities (rà àdivara) is the part of fools. Often, therefore, Beliaschau is only to choose, as ανθρωπος, δ βούλεται, τοῦτο και οἴεται. Charit. iii. 9: vi. 6; Platon. Ion. p. 532. D. βουλοίμην αν σε άληθη λέγειν. et in Euthyd. p. 278. Ε, βουλόμενοι ed mearren. And it is never therefore used of brutes, as Ammonius has already observed. For since brutes destitute of reason cannot deliberate whether an object is to be sought or avoided, in which is the force of Boursoday, (whence βουλή), but are led by the blind impulse of instinct or habit, they cannot be said Βούλεσθαι. Yet both θέλειν and βούλεσθαι are applied to inanimate things, especially in the way of interrogation, τί θέλει, τί βούλεται τοῦτο. The former occurs in the New Testament. Acts ii. 12, τί αν θέλοι τοῦτο είναι. Valckenar on Herod. iv. 131, says, that τί τοῦτο βούλεται is more used, and βούλεται λέγειν or shau. But the mode in which they are used seems to differ. Certainly, when it is said, τί θέλει τοῦτο είναι or λέγειν, the inquiry is made, what should or can this thing be or say; as in that passage of Herodotus and others, which Valckenar approves, (was soll das seyn s. werden), almost similar to τί μέλλει τοῦτο είναι. So, in Euripid. Hippol. v. 865, ίδω τί λέξαι δέλτος ήδε μω. Θέλει, But τί βούλεται τοῦτο, although it may be rendered in that way, what does this will? yet it seems to be in that particular sense, that it inquires especially into the end or counsel of the thing, which is said βούλεσθαι. If, therefore, it is said, τί βούλεται τοῦτο είναι, the sense would be, to what does this tend? was soll das vorstellen s. bedeuten. For often Bobles an elvar is said of those who wish to appear what really they are not, as in Lucian, ii. Alex. p. 214, concerning the woman, ἐράσμιον ἔτι είναι βουλομένην; he could not have written έθέλουσαν: and hence it will appear why it is written τί σοι βούλεται τοῦτο, and never, if I remember accurately, τί σοι θέλει rovro. For there is in this interrogation a question as to the end and utility of the thing, as in Lucian, iii. p. 427, τί βούλουντο αὐτῷ τηλικαῦται πύλιπες, των περαμέων ίσα δυναμένων. and i. Dial. Mort. p. 446, ουχ όςῶ, τί σοι βούλεται τὸ ἐςώτημα, i. e. for what reason you ask this? To what does the question tend? Compare also Hermot, p. 754.

I have said that βούλεσθαι denotes propension and inclination of the will. This is confirmed by a passage from James, c. i. 18, βουληθείς ἀπεκύησεν ἡμᾶς λόγψ ἀληθείας. A parallel passage occurs in Plato, Legg. iv. p. 712, Οδον δή τι λέγειτ Bouln Sels peal is rapisses on One writer, however, most strangely supposes that βουληθείς is put elliptically for Boulandic is hum. But Wahl. properly compares it with sudoxfous, he hath begotten us, according to his good pleasure. Hence also βούλεσθαι τά τινος means to favour the interests of any one. Thucyd. vi. 50. Certainly that person appears to have been deceived by some passages of the Septuagint, where Silan is rau is given as the rendering of the Hebrew YDT. But βούλεσθαι έν την never occurs; and it would be absurd. For, in the only passage, I Sam. xviii. 25, איז חפץ לכולך ות in which the Septuagint has thus rendered the words, οὐ βούλεται ὁ βασιλεὺς ἐν δόματι, it is a weak version; for, in fact, desire, and not good will, is expressed.

"Taylor, in his Hebrew Concordance, gives, as the meaning of the word ΥΕΙΤ, desire, pleasure, delight; and the simple rendering of this passage, according to the Hebrew idiom, is, "There is not delight to the king in dowry." And the force of this expression may be softened to meet the style of later languages, as it is in our version, "The king desireth not dowry," and which has so far followed the Septuagint. But that version has very needlessly retained the Hebraism "TIDD by rendering it is δάμασι; and has thus made the whole sentence weak and ineffective. It were better either to retain the simpler and more forcible style of

And we must not refer to this formula the words of Paul in Coloss. ii. 18, μηδείς ὑμᾶς κασα-Βραβευέτω θέλων έν ταπεινοφροσύνη και θρησκεία των αγγέλων. Many interpreters connect θέλων with the preposition is, and render it, affecting humility, and taking pleasure in it. But, in the first place, such a barbarous formula is unknown to the New Testament. In the next place, there is no need to increase the number of solecisms, while another and more probable interpretation is fairly open to us; and finally, as it had been stated in v. 16, un our ris upas πεινέτω εν βεώσει, it was in accordance with this το say, μηδείς ύμᾶς καταβραβευέτω έν ταπεινοφροσύνη. Let no man, he says, judge you in external things, or deceive you by that σαπεινοφεοσύνη and βεησκεία. And βέλων therefore is, in my opinion, intentionally, wittingly, (consulto,) as in the original, or to transmute it altogether into the more modern mode of expression. Nothing, therefore, can here be made of the force of βούλιοθαι ἐν, for it is only a servile rendering of the Hebrew preposition]. The sentence is "done into Greek," rather than translated. It may be remarked also, that in almost every instance in which the LXX has rendered ΥΕΠ by βούλιοθαι, the true force of the word goes beyond the Greek expression; and implies not only propension of the will, but delectation, and emotion of the affections. See Deut. xxv. 7; Ruth iii. 16; 1 Kings xxi. 6.— T.

Herodot. ix. c. 14, πυθόμενος δε ταῦτα εβουλεύετο θέλων, είχως τούτους πρωτον έλοι. For in the word Sixen there is the notion of the will itself, and that, separately from the notion of consideration and consequent propension. He who does any thing θέλων does it at once spontaneously. He who does it βουλόμενος, determines to apply his mind to it, Θέλων πωω. I do it spontaneously, freely: πάσχω, I deserve it; as 2 Peter iii. 5. λανθάνει αὐτοὺς τοῦτο θέλοντας. But there is a difference from these forms of speech, when Sέλω is put with an infinitive of another verb, as θέλω ποιείν. It is often rendered as if it were φιλεῖν, to be wont, John viii, 44. In all words therefore compounded with Islan there is the notion of spontaneity, but in those compounded with βούλομαι, that of option and propension. So in Plato de Legibus, Lib. v. rd Boudnerou re και εκούσιον and το άβούλητόν τε και άκούσιον are put in opposition. The formula κζιν θέλης, κζιν μπ Sέλης is well known. But καν μή βούλη is never said. It is, therefore, doubtful whether in the New Testament Bédess ever means to desire, to choose, to be occupied or delighted with any thing, not even in Heb. x. 5, Susian xal secococcio οὐκ ήθέλησας, where the Hebrew would appear to warrant the notion of delight and oblectation. Certainly Marcus Antoninus has used the word according to the Hebrew sense, x. 8, οὐ πολαπεύεσθαι οἱ θεοὶ θέλουσιν, ἀλλ' ἰξομοιοῦσαι αὐτοῖς τὰ λογικὰ πάντα.

θυμός δεγή.

It has been observed, both by Eustathius and others, that these two words are synonyms. And in fact, that they are not used indifferently in the New Testament, may be shown by those passages in which they occur together, Eph. iv. 31; Coloss. iii. 8; Rom. ii. 8; Apocal. xix. 15. We read also in Apoc. xvi. 19, t The Apostle has, according to his usual practice, quoted from the Septuagint, as the established Greek version of the Scriptures; in which certainly asianous does not give the whole force of YET; but then it is somewhat remarkable, that the true meaning is given in the word suddensus, in verse 6, and is repeated again in v. 8, as if the Apostle, seeing the comparative weakness of the LXX version, gave, from his own knowledge of the Hebrew, the proper idea of delectation and pleasure, to complete the sense; for sudénueus is not the true meaning of the parallel word שאלה. Scholars must be aware that there is a still more remarkable discrepancy here between the quotation in the New Testament and the Hebrew, on which it would be out of place to enter here; but certainly to those who hold, with the translator, the view of the verbal inspiration of sacred Scripture, there is no point requiring more full and patient investigation than the quotations in the New Testament from the Septuagint, or some other Greek version of the Old Testament, and their discrepancy from the present Hebrew text .- T.

Ŀ

bunds नमें હેલ્લમેંદ which is generally considered to be an expression for extreme wrath. But young students should be on their guard against such observations, lest when two nouns are found together of which one is in the genitive case, and as it were dependent on the other, they conclude over hastily, either that this is a mere periphrasis, or an increment of the force of the word in the genitive. although a substantive, followed by the genitive case, is often, both in Greek and other languages, put instead of an adjective, yet the true force of such an expression must be ascertained by the relation of the words themselves; for, frequently, this mode is adopted more for the full description and amplification of the subject, than for the increased intensity of the thought. Fischer has collected many examples, though some are foreign to the purpose, in Welleri Gram. Tom. iii. p. 269. cannot, however, be shown, that if two synonyms are placed together, as θυμός τῆς δεγῆς, that it is meant to express the superlative degree of the one in the genitive case. For the case is very different, when two nouns of different meaning are joined, in order to increase the force of the one, as Znhos mugós Heb. x. 27. In this place, therefore, duple the degree means only the boiling of rage, as we say, Hitze des Zornes.

But to return to the difference of these two words. It is commonly asserted from too great confidence in some grammarians, that δργή and θυμός so far differ, that θυμός is exacerbation of mind, anger kindling into existence; όργή is wrath daily enduring and inveterate. We are warned that this difference is not always the case. And rightly enough, for in fact it is false. For bumbs and beyn differ not as to the duration, but as to the nature of the feeling. For as θυμός strictly means the soul, from the spirit which we breathe out; it is subsequently used to express a more intense passion of the mind as a more forcible exhalation. And therefore butter is thus described as and rise θύσεως και ζέσεως της ψυχης. 'Οργή, however, denotes anger, together with the desire of revenge. Zeno says on Diogen. Laert. vii. 113,

The word ier is from [7], which in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic, means to kill, and all the tumults of passion which terminate in killing. There are traces of it in modern languages, in the German word krieg, war, contention; in the French word orgueil, which is properly, fierté, and the English word, rage. The idea therefore of sanguinary revenge, attaches etymologically to ieris. The Hebrew word [7], is expressive of a less violent feeling, and it has been transmitted to us in the same qualified sense, δεγή έστη έπιθυμία τιμωρίας του δοκούντις ήδικηκέναι ο προςηπόντως. For although δυμός often issues in anger or rage, i. e. in the actual desire of punishing the injurer, yet in the word considered separately, there is not the notion of anger or passion, any more than in deyn there is the idea of diuturnity. See Nemes. de Nat. Hum. c. 21. Xenophon says correctly (जाहारे निका. 9. 2,) देवरा मिथानेद्र निकाल वैकाह वेहाने के प्रेटिकाल. conf. §. 7. et de Venat. 10. 14. And hence we may understand why igy is often put in the New Testament for vengeance and punishment, but dupos never. Yet in 2 Cor. xii. 20, bumos is said to mean anger. It stands in connection with other terms έρελς, ζήλω, θυμώ, iei βείαι, χαταλαλιαί. But even here δυμοί is rather the enmities of a morose and passionate man, (Feindschaften, Erbitterungen.) Plutarchus de Coriolano (init. p. 59. ed. Tubing. vol. ii.) θυμοῖς δ' αὖ πάλιν χεώμενον ἀπεάτοις και Φιλονεικίαις άτερπτοις, ου ξάδιον ουδ΄ ευάρμοστον άνθρώποις συνείναι ragelyse. And Aristotle in Problem. Sect. xxx. on the melancholic says, igurixoi xai suxingrol agos ira, ire, irritate; and aro, arsit, to burn. Supis, is probably from The cogitatio, cogitavit, se ferocius gessit. It is animus, mind, the working and fermenting of mind, and putting it forth in external demonstration of strong feeling or passion. This etymology justifies the remarks made by the author upon the usage of the two words.—T.

τοὺς θυμοὺς καὶ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας, where evidently the idea of wrath is not at all intended. Other synonymous terms noticed by grammarians, do not occur in the New Testament.

έπιθυμέω ὀξέγομαι, (ἐπιθυμία. ὄζεξις.)

Both these words mean desire. But ἐπιθυμέω denotes rather the affection of mind. and imilyulia the inward passion and concupiscence; δεέγομαι the appetite and tendency towards the external object. In έπιθυμία only the mental desire is thought of (die Begierde selbst); but egs has conjoined with it the notion of the thing desired, (Verlangen nach etwas.) So that ἐπιθυμων may be used absolutely as Rom. vii. 7; xiii. 9, but δεέγεσθαι never. And although δείξεις is sometimes used for appetites, without the notion appended of the objects desired, as Herodian, vi. 1. 12, τας δεέξεις ακμαζούσας είς αίσχεας έπιθυμίας, (comp. i. 6. 6.); yet ὁςέγεσθαι is never, to my knowledge, used absolutely and independently. For the same reason in Dulle in the same reason in Superior rivés is to be moved with the desire or passion for any thing. The word in the genitive, placed in regimen with the noun in Supia, denoting the seat or fountain of the ἐπιθυμία; as in the New Testament frequently ἐπιθυμία σαςκός; and especially in that difficult text John viii. 44. But des gis rivés denotes the object desired. So egetis oaguis would be the desire to eat flesh, (Verlangen nach Fleisch.) For that one passage in the Book of Wisdom, xxiii. 6, χοιλίας δρεξις και συνουσιασμός μη καταλα-Sérusar us, cannot be adduced, not only because the sayings of this writer are altogether without authority; but also that " set is xwlias may very properly be referred to the desire of filling the It is well known that words in the genitive, connected with another noun, frequently denote the object, not the subject. grammarians have accumulated examples, and Hermann (on Viger, p. 877,) has shown the reason of this. But κωλία may, in this passage, be used in the same sense in which it occurs in other passages of the LXX. as Job iii. 11, xxxi. 15, Genes. xxv. 23, with which συνουσιασμός agrees.

We must observe, in passing, that imθυμικα and ἐπιθυμία, are not always put for licentious passion, but for a virtuous and tender desire of the soul; the wish for a real good, as Luke xxii. 15, Phil. i. 23, I Tim. iii. 1. Finally, ἐπιθυμικα κατὰ τινος, is not to be contrary to any thing, but, by passion, to be led contrary to any thing; as Gal. v. 17, ἡ σάςξ ἐπιθυμικα κατὰ τοῦ πνεύματος, τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα κατὰ τῆς σαςκός, i. e. the tendency of the flesh is against the spirit, and of the spirit is against the flesh; and ταῦτα ἀντίπειται ἀλλήλως, these are opposed to each other (scil. σὰςξ καὶ πνεῦμας) so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

12 .m // 17

έκπλήσσεσθαι. έκθαμβεῖσθαι. ἐξίστασθαι.

These words are similar; for they all denote the affection of mind which arises out of the presentation of a new, unexpected, and great object to the eye or the mind. They differ, however, not only in degree, but in the nature of the affection. ἐκπλήσσεοθαι has the most extensive meaning. It is used of all things by which the mind is powerfully affected, not only with fear, sorrow, anger; but also of those more pleasing objects, the aspect of which stimulates us in a pleasing manner to love, reverence, or delight." Frequently, therefore, the cause by which any one ἐκπλήττεται is added. So Xenoph. Sympos, 4. 23, ὑπὸ τοῦ ἔρωτος ἐχπλαγέντα. Euripid. Hel. v. 1413. ἀνδεδς χάρισιν έκπεπληγμένην. v. 291. θάμβει ἐκπλαγέντες. Med. v. 8. ἔρωτι θυμών έκπλαγείσα. In the New Testament it is applied to auditors, έξεπλάγησα, έπλ τη δίδαχη αὐτοῦ; and to the parents of Jesus, Luke ii. 48, ίδόντες αὐτὸν έξεπλάγησαν, i. e. with joy and admiration, when they found him in the midst of the doctors. But in außeite au, which occurs three times in Mark, is applied to those who, by the sight or consideration of some great or fearful thing, are horrified; not only because the object itself gives rise to fear, but also because the mind is scarcely able to conceive of its magnitude. So in Mark ix. 15, εὐθέως ὁ ὅχλος ίδω αὐτον ἐξεθαμβήθη, i. e. were astonished as any one is wont to be, when the object then spoken of is presented suddenly. In Mark xvi. 5, 6, it denotes wonder, coupled with fear. Finally, xiv. 33, it is said of our Lord ήςξατο έκθαμβεῖοθοι και άδημονεῖν (Matth. xxvi. 37, λυπεῖσθαι και άδημ.) Luther has rendered this zu zittern und zu zagen, in a way more adapted to customary speech than to the true force of the word; and not in accordance with our Lord's character, whose habit it was to regard his death as instant, and to foretel it. But when the hour of death arrived, it could not be but that his mind must be intensely affected by the immediate contemplation of a form of death, not only cruel, but of the severest suffering: not, as some older theologians have said, that he shrunk with fear from that death or those sufferings. though it must be conceded to human nature, in its most resolute form, that the spirit, in such a crisis, would be considerably affected; yet he who was conscious that he was in the path of duty, and who was endued with the very wisdom of Deity, and who knew himself to be commissioned by his Father expressly that he might die for the salvation of the human race, would regard all perturbation or dread as altogether foreign to him and unworthy. They therefore write either in folly or in malice who choose to aver from such passages as this, that our Lord Only understood, at a later period of his course, the necessity of his death, when he saw that either death must be submitted or the cause of truth betrayed; for that otherwise, he would not have been in such uneasiness if he had not hoped originally that the course of events would have been more prosperous. But of this I have spoken elsewhere.

^{*} Query, No admirabile esse vel fieri, Alnessu, placeo, please.— T.

From 727, miratus est, obstupuit.— T.

Finally, ižioraodai is said of those who, by any event, are so far disturbed that they are not quite in their senses, and know not what they think or say. In this sense it is often used in the New Testament. It occurs also in Mark iii. 21, žλεγον γὰς ὅτι ἐξέστη; where it does not mean that they said Jesus was out of his mind; but they thought (this is often the force of ἔλεγον) that he was so pressed by the crowd as to lose his self-possession (ausser sich seyn.)

For this was not the opinion of enemies, but of friends, raw and airrow. This is evident from the connection axeverise is may aireve - Bisher theyer yas. For in the midst of the gathering crowd of Galileans, he held a great disputation with the lawyers who had followed him from Jerusalem, v. 22-30. His friends, therefore, feared on his account, lest any harm should happen to him, and therefore they went out to bring him in (xearifea), and rescue him from the multitude. The word is used peculiarly in 2 Cor. v. 13, eire yae ikiornuer, Dew eire owoeovouluer, buir. there, since a man cannot think who has lost his self-possession, it is often said that it forus-Sa, is, in this place, to be excessive, to boast exceedingly. And this, because it is opposed to suppose?. But it can scarcely be so understood, for what would be the meaning there of ižíorao ລິດເ ເພື່ອເພື່? For how could it be said that he did this to God, or for God's sake? Neither is it necessary to seek for an idea contrary to τῷ σωφρονείν. 1 Cor. xiii. 8. xv. 11, 2. Thes. ii. 15. I suspect, therefore, that ifioranda, in this passage, means to yield to another, as to way, place, honour, to prefer another to one's self, in which it is not unfrequent in Greek writers, See odar ežiorada. Xenoph. Sympos. iv. 31. And evidently so in Lucian, Sat. 7. ii. p. 390, καὶ ἐξίστην τῷ Δά. The sense, thereore, will be, "If I yield willingly, (ἐν καφδία.) I to it for God's sake;" for since all things are of God, I arrogate nothing to myself; if I betave with modesty ἐν προςώτω it is for your sakes, to whom especially I would be useful.
See note on Herodian, vol. viii. 8, 13.

pearizeur meeuman

These words are generally supposed to differ. They are both rendered, to care, to be solicitous; except that in some passages of the New Testament it is said that μεριμνῶν means to be too solicitous, to be over anxiously careful. For although both words carry the meaning of to care, yet they differ. For φροντίζων means only to care, to aim, to meditate, to give diligence, that a thing may be done or be present. So it occurs once in the New Testament, Titus iii. 8. Να φροντίζωσι καλῶν ἔργων πρὰδοναιδαι, to be careful. But μεριμνῶν is so to care, as to be truly solicitous that the thing should not be wanting. Wherefore our Lord rightly warns his disciples, Matth. x. 19, ut μεριμιήσεται πῶς ἢ τί λαλήσετε δοθησεται γὰρ ὑμιν-τί λαλήσετε. And also in Matth vi. 25, μη μεριμνατε ττ ψυχη ὑμῶν, i. e. be not solicitous, as if the things necessary to your life were about to fail you. And in verse 34, un our μεριμνήσετε είς την αύριον, be not solicitous about the morrow, so that although you know not what its events shall be, ye should so indulge mistrust as to increase by it the cares of to-day; ή γάς αυςιον μεςιμνήσει rà iauris, for on the morrow it shall be seen that no needful blessing shall be wanting. is not a care, even an earnest and solicitous care, for future things, which is reprehended; but that diffidence which originates in empty and baseless pride, and which agitates the mind and torments it during the whole course of life with fretful anxiety about earthly things. This is meant by the μέριμναι τοῦ αίῶνος, which συμπνίγουσι τον λόγον. And therefore our Lord says (v. 32.) πάντα ταῦτα τὰ Εθνη ἐπιζητεῖ, i. e. as the most important and exclusively desirable; but as for you, ζητείτε πρώτον την βαςιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ.

² φ_{εντίζιν} is from φ_{ενίω} φ_{ενι}; and the proper idea therefore is thought, consideration, the occupation of the mind with a subject of interest. μεμμιῶν is derived from amarum esse, amaritudine affects; which, in all the cognate dialects of the Hebrew, is used not only in the sense of bitter, physically as a taste, but as bitterness of spirit, and fretful care and solicitude.— T.

In Themistius, Orat. 26, we find placed together, φροντίσας και μεριμνήσας, και πολλάς νύκτας ἀυπνους καταμελετήσας. See Wettstein on Matth. x. 19. φρ.ντίζειν, we render, für etwas sorgen, but μεριμνῷν, sich etwas kümmern. It is properly therefore in this passage written, μη μεριμνήσετεν For this is the habit of the unbelieving mind, τῶν ἀπίστων καὶ μεμψιμοίρων. The affections of mind, however, which these words express are so nearly allied, that often one word appears to be permuted for the other. See Moeris, de Vocibus Atticis, v. μεριμνῶν, and the examples therein adduced.

CHAPTER X.

In the former chapter we spoke of a particular class of synonyms. Some examples of this kind remain to be noticed. And of these I will now speak briefly.

σχληρός. αὐστηρός.

To many persons these two words appear to have little or no difference. They render either of them, by the terms, austere, hard, severe, harsh, inhuman. And so far certainly they agree, that neither character, so properly designated, has a regard to that which is equitable, but so uses his right, that he remits nothing. from a feeling of lenity or mercy. Yet they differ, (as in German our words streng and hart.) For he is austragos, who although he is not altogether alien from the tenderness of humanity, yet represses it within him, because, under the force of reasons of justice, he thinks that nothing of his right, and of that which is due to him, should be conceded. But he is σαληείς, who asserts his right because the principle of humanity is wanting. The aborness would remit and indulge, but thinks that he ought not; the σαληχός has no wish to do so. A father who is αὐστηχός cannot be condemned, but a father who is σαληχός is a bad man.

In Matth. xxv. 24, the same master is called σκληχός, whom the same servant, in Luke xix. 21, is made to call adorness. And hence it is concluded that the two words have the same meaning. We should take care, however, in treating parallel passages of this kind, if we find the same thing expressed in different words, not to conclude too hastily that the words do not differ in sense. This is a frequent error of lexicographers. For when two authors narrate the same fact in such a way, that they make use of different words, by which the general bearing of the narration is not affected, I ask on what ground are we entitled to affirm, that the two different words carry precisely the same meaning? So far we must admit, they are said, and may be said, of the same thing; but that they mean the same thing precisely is not yet proved. Neither, in the estimation of such men as the one mentioned in the parable, is there any great difference between a severe or strict master and a harsh and merciless one. He who is oxlyeos is deservedly blamed, as in Aristotle's Ethics, iv. 8, ayein nai oxlyen; but the aborness cannot be blamed. Plutarch. Quaest. Gr. cap. 40, καλὸς δὲ ῶν καὶ δίκαιος, οὐχ ἦττον ἦν σώφεων καὶ αὐστηρός.

метре, циюс. Χενοιρε (αδαητης Χενοιρινό^{*})

These words are the opposite of the two former ones; they agree as expressions of lenity of mind; yet they differ. For means is gentle, who endures all things with an even temper (saustmuthiq;) # suc is mild, especially towards the faults of others (gelinde, mild;) xeneros, kindly, who wishes well, and desires to benefit others (quitiq.) Therefore in Matthew xxi. 5, βασιλεύς πραύς is not benign, but gentle, tender, free from proud ferocity; as in Pindar Pyth. iii. v. 124, βασιλεύς πραύς άστοῖς, οὐ φθονέων άγαθοῖς. Compare Matthew xi. 29, or negos sind xal ταπεινός τῆ καιδία. And in 1 Peter iii. 4. πραύ καλ ήσύχιου πυεύμα is a meek and quiet spirit. Finally, the wears in Matthew v. 5, are free from that haughty self-sufficiency, in which the Jews made their boast of promised happiness; and therefore, it is said πληςονομήσουσι την γητ, see Wetstein on this passage. The force of hours may be sufficiently shown by one passage, 1 Thess. ii. 7, δυνάμενοι έν βάρει είναι, ως χαιστοῦ άπόστολοι, έγενήθημεν ήπιοι έν μέσφ ύμῶν, ὡς ἄν τροφὸς θάλπη τὰ ἐαυτῆς τέχνα; as in Homer, πατής δ ὡς η̃πιος η̃εν. περίος denotes tenderness of spirit; ### πος the exhibition of that tenderness in bearing with others; (gelinde, mild bey der Behandlung andrer.) In 2 Tim. ii. 24, the servant of the Lord must not strive (i. e. about useless questions,) but ### πος είναι πρὸς πάντας, i. e. he must be gentle in bearing with the opinions of others, διδαχτικὸν, ἀνεξίκακον, ἐν πραφέτητι παιδεύοντα τοὺς ἀντίδιατιθεμένους. He is ##πος who seeks to the utmost of his power, not to annoy or distress others. So we find ##πια φάρμακα, Iliad. δ. 212; and ##πια ἀκέσματα, Aeschyl. Prometh. v. 481. And in Herodot. iii. 89, we find ##πιος opposed to χαλεπός.

In the word χεηστός the presiding notion is benevolence, benignity. Our Lord says of the Father that he is χεηστόν ἐπὶ τοὺς ἀχαείστους καὶ ποτηςοὺς, Luke vi. 35. For he who is χεηστός not only is kind to the good but to the evil. This injunction had preceded: Love your enemies. The ἀχάριστοι καὶ ποτηςοί are those who, regardless of benefit received, act wickedly, and are to all ἄχεηστοι. Compare Ephes. iv. 32, and 1 Cor. xv. 32, and Wetstein's notes. Often also χ;ηστοί and ποτηςοί are opposed to each other. In Matthew xi. 30, ὁ ξυγός μου χεηστὸς καὶ τὸ φορτίον μου ἐλαφρόν ἐστι, it is commonly thought that χεηστός, is easy, pleasant. But I rather think that here also it is, benign. For the yoke of the law, especially in connexion with the traditions and comments of the Pharisees was ποιηρός: (φορτία δυσβάστακτα Matth. xxiii. 4. Luke xi. 46.) and yet it was axeneros; but the Curis τοῦ χριστοῦ was χρηστός, i. e. benign (ein wohlthätiges Joch:) for he who bears it feels himself to be more blessed as he goes forward. But let young students be on their guard, lest they so conceive of the poerior idapeir, as to suppose that the precepts of Christian duty are easy to be observed—which is very incorrect; for it may be easy enough to abstain from certain meats; but ζην κατά πνιῦμα, is not so easy; to overcome every rebellious passion, and constantly to obey the divine commandments, not by the fear of punishments or the hope of reward, but solely from the love of truth and virtue, and of the holy authority which commands it. And vet it may be said truly, έλαφεδν το φορτίον, i. e. εύφορον χαὶ εὐβάσταχτον, because it does not depress the soul, but nourishes and confirms it day by day; so that daily it is made χεηστότερος και έλαφεότερος. For many are the xουφά to the narrow-minded man, especially if they are ἐπίχευσα; but ἀφύερτα έλευθέρω ἀνδρί, as in Lucian, 1. Merc. cond. 13. p. 669. But to return. In Romans ii. 4, it will be granted by all that re xgngrov rou Seou means the benevolence of God; but then they say that xenorisms in the New Testament, not only denotes benevolence or beneficence, as Rom. ii. 4, xi. 22, 2. Cor. vi. 5, &c., but also the benefit derived from benevolence, as in Ephes. ii. 7, πλούτον της χάριτος αυτού έν χρηστότητι έφ' ήμας έι Χριστῷ 'Ιησοῦ. But in this passage χάρις seems rather, as elsewhere, to express the benefit conferred on us, by divine benevolence, through Jesus Christ. In Titus iii. 4, also, who does not see that xenoring denotes not the benefit but the benevolence? If we are to give heed also to the lexicographers, even iminate does not differ from those words of which we have spoken, for they render it mild, clement, indulgent, lenient, humane, and imiliacia clemency, humanity. But in ἐπιεικής there is not the notion of a mind moderate, mild, merciful; which renders the three former words synonymous; but emisings is rather one who is easy, yielding, not obstinate, (gefällig, nachgiebig,) opposed to γαλεπός, But all this is well known.

rhanes appear avonros asoveros.

with the substantives

άνοια· άφεοσύνη· μωεία.

All these words so far agree as they express a certain deficiency of intellect, whether this shows itself in thinking or acting. Yet they differ very widely.

The word wisses is properly expressive of age, and therefore it does not denote vice, absolutely; nor is it predicated properly of man only, but frequently it is used to express an incautious ingenuous man, unsuspicious of evil; it is put for that simplicity of mind which is so pleasing in youth.

But since in adults this quality is deservedly reproved, as unworthy of a mature mind, it is used as a term of reproach towards those who think, feel, and act like children, when from their years they ought to have made further advances. In the New Testament, however, it often occurs without the idea of reprehension. So Matth. xi. 25, Luke x. 21, Gal. iv. 3, Rom. ii. 20. Hence musi Xelor 1 Cor. iii. 1. In the same way mariazen occurs 1 Cor. xiv. 20, μή παιδία γένεσθε ταϊς φρεσίν, άλλα τῆ κακία νησιάζετε. as in Xenoph. Ages. i. 17. saída sỹ ả sásn. Ephes. iv. 14, they are called virus, who, like infants, are incautious and easily deceived. The word stands opposed to arrig réduce v. 15. (comp. Heb. v. 13.)

The word appear denotes one who does not rightly use his mental powers. And this is not always used in a bad sense. For what the lexicographers say, that it means foolish, senseless, pagan, impious, villainous, and even ostentatious, must be rejected, together with their · other frequent trifling. It answers, in fact, to our word unverständig; which is not only applied to boys, but to any who, without actual blame, are destitute of the true knowledge of things; and it is said sometimes without the idea of blame. So it occurs almost invariably in the New Testament. In Rom. ii. 20, wasδευτής άφεόνων and διδάσχαλος νησίων occur together; and in 2 Cor. xi. 19, we read notions you directed των άφεόνων, φεόνιμω δντις. Neither are the άφεονις, impious, or vain and insolent boasters; for the pgónpos, could not properly bear with such; but they are rather men who find pleasure in light and trifling things; and are called apposes, because they do not understand that such things are vain and perishing. Luke xii. 20, 21. Such men the people not only bear with, but they may do so ἡδίως, i. e. without anger. this sense Paul, in verse 16, calls himself appear, because after the manner of men he boasted. έν άφροσύνη, i. e. ως άφρων. For as they are φρόνιμω who rightly estimate things around them, so men who are deceived by foolish vanities, yet boast themselves, are called appores. So in Xenophon Apol. we find ἀφεονεστέςα ή μεγαληγορία; and Sympos. 4. 55, they are called appose, who were pleased with the deceits of a Sicilian. In 1 Peter ii. 15, it is joined with ἀγνωσία; which is put for the ignorance of men who are influenced by mere outward appearance. Commonly it is there interpreted, calumny, probably because it occurs thus, ριμοῦν τὴν τῶν ἀρχώνων ἀγνωσίαν. But φιμοῦν in this passage is simply to coerce.

The word axing differs from both the former. It is foolish, stupid, either that which is really wanting in right reason, (unverninftig); or that it is not properly called out; so that, although a man may appear to himself to follow a certain rule in acting, yet he is in fact guided by false rules, both in thought and action. Paul, therefore, calls the Galatians avonra; because, although they thought themselves very wise, they were, in fact, decidedly false teachers, and had returned to the old superstition. And the anotra are rightly opposed to the offor; Rom. i. 14; and Titus iii. 3. huer yae more nal hueig aronro, i. e. we followed a wrong course of living, not we were without a proper knowledge of religion. And when Jesus, Luke xxiv. 25, called his two disciples, ἀνοήτους και βραδείς τῆ καρδία, it is plain that he could not, and would not, upbraid their weakness and slowness of intellect; but he calls them avonros, because they had formed from the Scriptures a false hope respecting the Messiah, and had consequently sunk into despondency.

Luther well renders it: Thoren. Neither, as we lately observed, is Bradeis ri zardia slow of mind or stupid: nor βεαδύς τῆ καεδία taken by itself, incredulous; but the whole formula βραδοῖς τῆ & າວົ ສາອາະປະເທ, expresses an incredulous man, one hard of belief. For when Beadus is said of the mind of man, the kind of slowness is determined by the rest of the sentence. A man may be either βραδύς είς το λαλήσαι, βραδύς είς δργήν. (James i. 19.) είς το συνιέναι, είς το πιστεύειν. But βραδύς alone never means slowness of intellect or stupidity. Theophrastus rightly says, ch. 14. (27.) ἀναισθησίαν βεαδυτήτα ψυχής ἐν λόγοις καλ πεάξιση, which passage is sometimes adduced to show that βιαδύς means stupid. Polybius also, whom (iv. 8. 7.) they say had affirmed the Thessalonians to be αχεήστους και βεαδείς useless and stupid, had said a little before that the same man was often συνετώτατος και βεαδύτατος. Certainly in both passages the word denotes slowness of action. But let students beware how they confide in examples brought from other writers. But to return. In 1 Tim. vi. 9. when the Apostle speaks of iπιθυμίαι ανοήτοι, he does not mean passions which make men mad, as some render it: but which are themselves wild and irrational, as προθυμία ἄφρων in Eurip. Herc. Fur. v. 310. Compare Schol. on Aristoph. Nub.

v. 426. ama frequently means want of mind, not want of piety; as Luke vi. 11, and 2 Tim. iii. 9; but the word among appears to agree more fully with the proper meaning of the word among; of which word Moeris gives some examples on the word in historic.

Finally, &ourses expresses density and inaptitude of mind to perceive that which is true and just. For the word activeros s. activeros, is used by the Greeks in two ways, both of a heavy and stupid man, who is wanting in intellectual acumen; and of those things which are difficult of comprehension, and only to be apprehended by men of acuteness, by the In this latter sense it does not occur in the sacred writings: See Valkenar on Euripid. Phoen. v. 1510; but in the former sense it is used both in the New Testament, and by other writers; although it is somewhat surprising that the Greeks have used the same word both in the active and passive sense. And, in the same way, they use ourserbs, both of him who readily and acutely perceives, and of the thing easily understood. There are some who affirm, that in Rom. i. 31, and x. 30, dovreros is wicked, wanting in true religion; but without any ground, except that in Suidas we find aguistrous rous aguision rous. But in the midst of an enumeration of particular vices, we could hardly expect to find the general notion of wickedness or improbity; and in c. x. 30, where a evidently means a people so far inferior to the Jews in understanding, as to be the object of contempt. (our Suc.)

In fine, νήπιος is one who is yet inexperienced, unknowing; ἄφρων, one who does not use his rational powers; ἀνίητος, who, although he appears to know, yet thinks and acts perversely; ἀσύνιτος, one who, from density of mind, does not perceive truth and right. The fault of the ἀφρωνίς is ἀφρωνίνη, and the ἀνοήτοι, μωρία, in the νηπίοι, ἀπλότης, in the ἀσυνίτω, ἀσυνισία. We will turn now, however, to some other examples.

εὐσεβής. εὐλαβής εὐσέβεια εὐλάβεια.

These words are synonymous; for they are all used to express piety, Luke ii. 25, ἀνης δίπαιος και εὐλαβής. Acts κ. 2, εὐσεβής και φοβούμενος τὸν Θεόν. Heb. κii. 28, μετὰ αἰδοῦς και εὐλαβείας. 1 Tim. ii. 2, ἐν πάση εὐσεβεία καὶ σεμνότητε. Passages, however, occur, in which their several and special significations must be observed. εὐσεβής and εὐλαβής differ, inasmuch as εὐσεβής expresses that reverence for the Deity which shows itself in actions, especially in the worship of God; but εὐλαβής indicates that disposition, which dreads and avoids the doing any thing contrary to right, and diligently labours, therefore, to fulfil all the duties of piety and humanity. εὐλαβής is the pious man, who is governed by the thought of the divine sanctity, and always fears lest he should do, or think, any thing opposed to the divine will, gottesfürchtig; a Godfearing man; but he is εὐσεβής who shows that piety by acting, fromm. Hence εὐλάβεια is that piety which governs the soul, Gottesfurcht; εὐσέβεια is the energy of piety in the life, both internal and external, Frommigheit, Gottseligkeit. Luther properly renders 1 Tim. vi. 6, ion & πορισμός μέγας ή εὐσέβεια μετά αὐταρχείας, wer gottseliq ist. For true piety has this power, that life is rendered desirable, even though destitute of external prosperity; and we find ourselves happy if it be only in an acquiescence in the providential government of God. That is εὐσίβεια μετ' αὐταρχείας. On the contrary, they are said to be most miserably in error, who are rouiscorres πορισμόν είναι την εὐσέβειαν, i. e. who look for mere earthly gain from their piety. It is piety per αὐταρχείας which is gainful. And εὐσέβεια in this passage, does not mean the Christian religion which leads to piety. It is ή κατ' εὐσέβειαν διδασκαλία v. 13, which is the institution for producing piety. Neither is το μυστήριον τῆς εὐσεβείας 1 Tim. iii. 16, as it is usually rendered, the mystery of religion, i.e. the Christian doctrine; but μυστήριον τῆς εὐσεβείας is that doctrine or matter to which all piety, i. e. Christian religion is to be referred. στὺλος καὶ ἐδραίωμα τῆς ἀληθείας, namely, θεὸς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκὶ κ. λ. That εὐσέβεια is that especially which shows itself in the life, is evident from Acts xxii. 12; ἀνής εὐσεβής κατὰ τὸν νόμον, as in Xenoph. Hist. Gr. i. 7, 10. κατὰ τὸν νόμον, εὐσεβουντες καὶ εὐοςκοῦντες, κρινεῖτε Compare Acts xvii. 23, 2 Tim. iii. 5. Wherefore Peter, 2 Epistle i. 6, exhorts Christians to show in their continence, patience, in their patience, εὐσέβεια, and in their εὐσέβεια, brotherly love.

But as εὐλαβής properly denotes timidity and caution, it is so said of piety, as that it exhibits the effects of piety on the mind rather than the principle of the life of piety. It occurs in this sense in the passages quoted. But there are two places adduced in which it is supposed that τοὺς εὐλαβεῖς, means proselytes of the gate; who elsewhere are spoken of by the terms φοβούμενοι and σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν. So Acts ii. 5. ἦσαν δὲ ἐν Ἱερουσαλημ κατοικοῦντες Ἰουδαῖοι, ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς, ἀπὸ παντὸς ἔθνους τῶν ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανόν. But first, there is no reason why we should admit the idea of proselytes, since there is nothing said concerning these men which may not be said of Jews generally. For it is evident that οἱ naronouvers in 'Isp. anders sudaBeis are only mentioned; because Jews, not only those born in Palestine and speaking Hebrew, but all those who journeyed from different provinces to Jerusalem, and spoke different languages or dialects, each severally heard these Apostles, who were Galileans, speak szaoros in ra idia διαλέπτω αὐτῶν, ἐν ή ἐγεννήθησαν. For when they are spoken of as κατοικούντες εν Ιερουσαλήμ, this is understood, with little reason, to refer to those proselvtes who are called ברי תושב: and who certainly received this appellation, not because they dwelt in Jerusalem, but because they were permitted to sojourn among the Israelites generally. For these sojourners lived not only in Jerusalem, but throughout the whole of Palestine, and amongst the Jews scattered through all the various provinces of the Roman Empire. Besides, they are called Ioudaio which name was not applied to the mere sojourning proselytes, but only to those who were proselytes of the covenant. Peter himself, calls them avoges ioudaioi xal oi xaroixouvres 'Iegoudalije änavres; but in v. 22, avders iseandiras. In v. 10. however, a distinction is drawn between ioudain τε καὶ πεοςήλυτοί. Finally, the whole line of argument which Peter adopts, would have been inapplicable to the sojourners among them.

whom the rulers of the Jews only required to observe the Noachic precepts; for Peter made use of examples which could only influence those who had embraced the whole law. That the term cannot be referred to proselvtes of the covenant may be understood from this, that these could neither be distinguished from Jews by this term, neither could they be called xarouxourse. For this word. if it indeed accords with the Hebrew term הרשב, is applicable only to the sojourners, to whom the rest of the description does not apply. They appear to me, therefore, to have been men, not born in Judea, yet of the Jewish nation, who were dwelling for a time at Jerusalem, among whom also it appears by v. 10, some were proselytes. For it is evident that xaroixen may be affirmed of all the dwellers at Jerusalem, and not only of the sojourners, Acts i. 19.

A second instance occurs of the use of the word εὐλάζης, where ἄνδζες εὐλαβεῖς are said to have buried Stephen. But there is no reason to suppose them proselytes either. And, lastly, there is a passage, Heb. v. 7, in which εὐλάβεια appears to be said of anxiety of mind, καὶ εἰςακουσθείς ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας. This is rendered: "and was heard and delivered from anxiety." But seeing that by this view, the series of thought is manifestly interrupted, (offering up ardent prayers, he was freed and accomplished a perfect obedience,) I would prefer to understand εὖλάζεια in the sense of piety, for the sake of which he was heard. For he received this reward of true piety, that he obtained that for which he prayed. For he did not ask to be set free from the suffering of death, but that in the enduring of death, he might experience that constancy and perseverance of mind which Luke relates to have been conferred on him, c. xxii. 42, 43. would appear, therefore, that all these words Καίπες ων υιός εμαθεν υπαχοήν, should be included in a parenthesis, that the other parts of the sentence may cohere together, δεήσεις προςενέγχας, εἰςὰχουθείς - και τελειωθείς ἐγένετο αἴτιος σωτηγίας.. On this use of the preposition ἀπὸ, see Abresch. Dilucid. Thuc. p. 144, and Morus ad Isocr. Paneg. p. 55.

It is a groundless complaint which some persons have made, that some vocables in the New Testament are used so vaguely and indefinitely, that among their various meanings it is not always apparent which is to be attached to them in each particular instance. Whence it arises, that to the same vocable sometimes they affix the generic and sometimes a certain specific signification. But any one may perceive that this would be an erroneous mode of interpretation. For if a word denotes any thing which has several forms united under one common genus, but different in species, it is certainly possible that the generic word may be predicated of each particular species; but it would be very absurd to say, that the word denoted all the particulars which class under the one genus. It were ridiculous if any one in a German lexicon, among the meanings of the word Holz (wood), should enumerate all the species of wood as if they were expressed by the generic term; and should state, that it sometimes means the genus and sometimes the several species which compose the genus, and then give all the different kinds of trees, as Bauholz, Brennholz, Nutzholz. And is it not then equally ridiculous, when, in the lexicons to the New Testament, we see, affixed to any word, all the notions of the several things which are associated under it as separate species? It is one thing for a word to be predicated of several things, because the common or generic notion inherent in it, applies to those several things; it is another for that word to denote these several specific things. The examples of this error are innumerable, but in this discussion a few will suffice.

απαβαεσία ἀσελγεια άσωτία

These words are said to have at times a wider signification than at others; and sometimes to denote all improbity of manners and of life, at others, to represent only some special form of that general prayity. So that it must be sometimes doubtful what notion is in each place to be attached to the word. cause, however, of such ambiguity and hesitation, must be sought not in the negligence or carelessness of the writers, but in the ignorance of the true force of the word which they have used. These words may have been accounted synonymous, because each has the common notion of impurity of life-defiled by intemperate passions; yet each has its specific and proper force, which, if we observe accurately, we need never remain in doubt as to the meaning in each particular instance.

The word ἀκαθαροία has the most extensive meaning, for it denotes every kind of impurity of mind and conduct. But ἀσίλγια, and ἀσωτία, although they also are truly ἀκαθαροία; yet they denote a certain kind of ἀκαθαροία only; so that they cannot be permuted, as if it were the same thing whether acidyua, acuria, runia, or and they are written; and they are not so promiscuously used in the New Testament. For axadagea is used to express any kind of mental or moral impurity or uncleanness, and not merely impure passions and indulgences. So in 1 Thess. ii. 3, the raeanling is said to be made our in whame, oud if analagoras, οὐδὲ ἐπ δὸλου, neither in error, nor by impure council, nor in guile; and in c. iv. it is onposed to dizacorbin. And in Romans vi. 19, it is not synonymous with arquia, but it is said generally of all impurity of life. The sense is, 28 ye formerly παρεστήσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν δοῦλα τῆ and agaig nat of avoying, i. e. to impurity, and to improbity, eig ryv avoquian, so as to lead an impious and flagitious life; so now consecrate them to probity and virtue, (τρ ακαιοσύνη) είς άγιασμές, that you may lead a pure and holy life. I. know not but that the words sic arousar and sic àyuasuór might be taken in connection with σαριστήσατι; so that the sense would be, your members which formerly in the service of impurity, were devoted to impiety, now dound ri discussion, consecrate to holiness and chastity. There is a very similar passage in Ephes. iv. 19. ολτινές παρέδωκειν έαυτούς τη άσελγεία είς έργασίαν draSagoiaς πάσης in πλεονεξία. It seems, however.

opposed to this, that ragiorarai is joined sometimes with the dative, as v. 16.

The word ἀσέλγεια differs from ἀκαθαροια. ἀσελγής is properly petulant, saucy, impudent; one without modesty or retiredness, but who acts immoderately and with wantonness; and ἀσίλγεια, therefore, is the forwardness and peevish impertinence of the ἀσελγής, and not the obscenity and uncleanness of lust. This is proved by innumerable passages, which, after Henry Stephen, the lexicographers have heaped together. See also Westein on New Testament, vol. i. 588. In this sense it occurs in 2 Cor. xii. 21, joined with ana Sagoia and regreia, as in Cicero, pro Cael. 29, c. 12, there is a long harangue, de corruptelis, de adulteriis, de protervitate, de sumtibus. Rom. xiii. 13, 44 κοίταις και ἀσελγείαις; and in the list of vices given in Gal. v. 19. It is probably used to express filthy lust in 2 Peter ii. 7, 18; but in 1 Peter iv. 3, it seems rather to intimate wan-It is doubtful in what sense it is specially intended in Mark vii. 22. xhoxal, πλεονεξίαι, πονηρίαι, δόλος, ἀσέλγεια, δφθαλμός πονηρός, βλασφημία, ὑπερηφανία, ἀφροσύνη. It cannot mean lust, for it is classed with vices of another character, and that has been already noticed in v. The interpreters, therefore, generally 21.

render it injury; but it is rather insolence; the insolence of men, who, indulgent to their own passions, have no regard to that which is just and equal, but trample down every right of others, while they hurry on to their own object. In this sense it often occurs, among

I cannot trace satisfactorily the oriental root of this Probably if we could, we might arrive at a more distinct determination of its generic force, and thus reconcile the seeming discrepancy and obscurity which evidently at-There are traces of the original word in the whole of the Gothic family of languages. In the Gothic translation of the Gospel by Ulphilas, unselgam is the wicked. This word is still retained in German, unselig, miserable, fatal, condemned. And it occurs also without the negative particle, German selig, Danish salog, Anglo-Saxon saelig, in the sense of good, virtuous, and therefore in a secondary sense, happy. The Greek word asslyns is evidently compounded of the negative or privative a, and some oriental root corresponding in its consonants to the letters one, and identical with that word which came into Europe with the leaders of the Gothic migration, and which has retained its place even in modern times. If it shall be yet discovered through the film of some slight orthographical difference, it will most probably throw light upon the use of the Greek term. It is very probable that seligo, in Latin is not a compound, as the Lexicons state of se and ligo; but is another form of the yet undiscovered etymon of selig.

I am inclined to think that the original word is The which, in the Hebrew, is prospere fecit, profuit. It has the same sense in Chaldee and Syriac; and in Arabic is not only used in this sense, but carries also the idea of worth and other writers, but especially in Polybius; and in those passages which are sometimes compared with the text already quoted from Mark. In the same way Demosthenes charges Philip with ἀσίλγεια καὶ πλεονεξία. He puts together also ἀσιλγῶς καὶ ἀσιλγῶς, ἀσελγῶς καὶ προκετῶς and also ἀσελγῶς καὶ πολυτελῶς, as Aeschinus in Ctesiphon, p. 78, 5. διὰ τὴν ἀσίλγειαν τῆς δαπάνης. Nor does the word in the Epistle of Jude, v. 4, vary from the particular sense. For οἱ ἀσεβεῖς, τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν χάριν μετατιθέντες εἰς ἀσελγειαν are not altogether the impious and wicked, but the wanton, the insolent, οἱ τὸν κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἀρνούμενοι.

Finally, ἀσωτία is properly the worthless debauchery of a man, who leads a desperate life, as ἄσωτος is a worthless man. (See Cicero Tusc. iii. 8, et Gellius vii. 11.) Hence it is generally said of the profligate and dissolute, whom excellence. An recte habuit res, Probus fuit home; Integer, bonus, idoneus. It seems scarcely probable that a word should occur in the whole Gothic family of languages, and also in the cognate dialects of the mother tongue, expressing the same two ideas of worth and happiness, and composed of the same radical sounds, without a derivative connection existing between them. If we have been thus led to a right view of the origin of the word λείλγιια, then the general idea attached to it is, that of a course of moral conduct contrary to right, and issuing in misery.—T.

Cicero describes to the life in his Officiis ii. 55. and 16. So in Luke xv. 13. the prodigal son is said ἀσώτως ζην. And in Ephes. v. 18. μη μεθύσκισθε οἴνφ, εν φ έστιν ἀσωτία, it is not spoken of every kind of wicked impurity, of which drunkenness is the fountain, but of ruinous debauchery particularly. (Leiderlichkeit, libertinism.) Paul also desires that no such person should be chosen to the pastorship, who had τέχνα εν χατηγορία άσωτίας η άνυπόταχτα. And in 1 Peter iv. 3, the class of impure vices there spoken of is called in v. 4, ανάχυσις ασωτίας, as a sort of outpouring or cess-pool of debauchery. Compare Westein on Luke xv. vol. i. p. 758. There is no need for further examples in a case already sufficiently plain, so that this word might have been dismissed in a very few words, had it not, in some few instances, been used differently from its proper and specific meaning. For there are two common places to which, in the explanation of words of this class, many interpreters have recourse; for if the proper meaning of a writer, in any passage, does not appear sufficiently plain, they either conceive that he intends to express some unclean vice, or that he uses a general term for any kind of wickedness and impiety.

PRINTED BY J. THOMSON, MILNE SQUAI

BIBLICAL CABINET, Vol. I. and II.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

- "For the sake of Biblical Science in this country, we heartily wish this undertaking vigorous and able support, and all possible success."—Presbyterian Review.
- "We highly approve of the plan of this work; it could not begin better than with Ernesti's Institutes, a most sound treatise on the art of Interpretation."—Brit. Mag. No. 3.
- "We conclude, with strongly recommending the Biblical Cabinet as deserving the attention of our readers, and especially of our clerical readers."—Edin. Theol. Mag. No. 76.
- "This interesting collection will be as valuable for its internal excellence, as it is beautiful in its external form and its typography.—Our wishes are justly called forth, and our recommendation is cordially given, that this new contribution to the science of Biblical Criticism and Interpretation may be received by the public as it deserves; and that will be with warm approbation and extensive support.—Eelectic Review.
- "There is in the four tracts which compose this small but very neatly printed volume, a mass of sacred erudition, a depth of judgment, a comprehensive and reach of understanding, which, we regret to be obliged to say, are contributed by a society of men, amongst whom, in vain, we look for an Englishman.——
- "These Dissertations, we conclude, are all by German writers; for the unbounded learning, and unconquerable perseverance which they display, form, most happily for that great country, the peculiar characteristics by which the German nation is distinguished.—The importance of Studying the Old Testament, a dissertation by Professor Tholuck of Halle, is maintained with great ability."—Monthly Rev.
- "We cordially recommend the Biblical Cabinet to all our clerical readers. It should be in the hands of every minister, and every student of divinity."—Presbyterian Magazine.

Edinburgh, 38, George Street.

THE PUBLISHER begs leave respectfully to acquaint the Clergy, Students of Divinity, &c. that the following works may be expected to appear speedily :--

I. The Second Volume of the Principles of Biblical Interpretation, translated from the Institutio Interpretis of J. A. Ernesti. By the Rev. CHARLES H. TERROT. A. M. late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

II. THE INSTITUTES of Interpretation of the Old Testament, translated from the Original of Professor Pareau of Utrecht. By the Rev. Dr. Forbes, Professor of Humanity, &c. in King's College, Aberdeen.

III. A COMMENTARY on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, translated from the Original German of Professor THOLUCK of Halle. By the Rev. R. MENZIES.

IV. A COMMENTARY on the Gospel of St. John, translated from the German of Professor THOLUCK.

V. A Collection of Philological and Exegetical Tracts, illustrating difficult passages in the New Testament, translated from the works of Noesselt, Knappe, and Storr. By the Rev. THOS. BYRTH, A. M. of Magdalen Hall, Oxford. Perpetual Curate of St. James', Litchfield, Lancashire.

VI. A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, translated from the Original of WIENER, with Copious Illustrations from the Commentaries, on the same Epistle, by Boerger, Koppé, &c. By the Rev. W. CUNNINGHAM.

VII. A Philologico-Critical Commentary on the Origin and Authority of the Samaritan Version of the Pentateuch. Translated from the original of GESENIUS. By the Rev. Thos. Byrth, &c.

VIII. THE PROPHECIES of ISAIAH, translated and accompanied with a complete Philological, Critical, and Historical Commentary. From the Original German of Professor GESENIUS.

1X. On the Genius and Manners of the Jews in the time of the Ptolemies. On the Use of PHILO in the interpretation of the New Testament. Translated from the Original of Dr. Scheffer of Marburg.

X. The OLD TESTAMENT, illustrated from the Commentaries of Professors DATHE and ROSENMULLER of Leipzig.

THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY REFERENCE DEPARTMENT

his book is under no circumstances to be

	7	T
- 	- · · · · -
		_

		-
	1	1.

